It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

with its excellent arrangement of adaptation to the purposes of instruction, cannot fail to recommend it to general use. I most cordially approve of its introduction into our schools."

From Rev. J. M. ANDERSON, Principal of Ohio Female College, College Hill, Ohio.

"The book stands well the most careful scrutiny. I am particularly pleased with the fairness of its statements as to the results of battles, etc. The history of our country is rich enough in great deeds to warrant the historian in telling the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as to her reverses and misfortunes. Without truth, history is a delusion and a snare. In point of method, clearness, and succinctness of narration, also, I regard this book as incomparably the best manual of the kind that has appeared. None but a practical and experienced teacher could have produced such a model class-book. We shall lose no time in introducing it into this Institute."

From Miss JANE A. BARTHOLOMEW, the well-known teacher of History in the Connecticut State Normal School.

"In respect to symmetry of plan, proportionate arrangement of matter, correctness, clearness, and conciseness of statement, and in variety of explanatory information, it is superior to any other text-book in United States history used here. The seals of the States and miniature maps are valuable additions to the book; while the charts and questions for review, condensing gradually, as they do, its whole contents, meet a want which many teachers have neither the means nor ability to supply."

COLLEGE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, New York, March 21, 1899.

"From such examination as I have been able to give the Manual of General History, by John J. Anderson, A.M., I have formed the following opinion as to its merits. Its plan is comprehensive and judicious. The details are carefully chosen, and presented with clearness and accuracy. Superfluous and tedious matter is excluded; yet nothing of importance and within the grasp of young pupils is passed over in silence. At the same time, I would not hesitate to make trial of it as a syllabus or framework for the more ample and minute inquiries of a college course. As a collection of facts to be committed to memory by students, whether of the higher grade or the lower, it appears to me to be superior to any other school-book on the subject. It is particularly worthy of praise for its coming right down to the present time; and it is altogether the work of a highly intelligent teacher for intelligent scholars. To both these classes of persons I heartily recommend it.

—CHARLES E. ANTHON,
"Professor of History, etc., College City of New York."

From Prof. THOMAS H. BURROWS, President Agricultural College, Penn., in the Pennsylvania School Journal.

"In a very small compass this book (Anderson's Manual of General History) gives the whole History of the world, from the Creation to the end of President Johnson's term of office in this country; and gives it, too, in as pleasant and attractive style as probably is possible in a narrative which admits of nothing more than the briefest mention of the thousands of events to be recorded. We like especially the maps illustrating the chief historical periods—such as those of the Persian Empire, ancient Greece, the Roman Empire, that of Charlemagne and the contemporary monarchs, etc. These are very instructive. We can endorse this as a good compend of general history."

From Prof. WM. PRESTON JOHNSON, Prof. of History and English Literature, Washington College, Lexington, Va.

"It is very hard to make a good elementary history, but the author appears to know how to teach and what to teach. His combination of geography with historical teaching is necessary, and he seems to give proper weight, but not undue place to chronology."

From R. M. LUSHER, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, La., and Agent for the Peabody Educational Fund.

"This Manual is one of the best compilations I have ever seen, and it certainly must effect a reform in the teaching of history in high schools and academies. The maps and chronological recapitulations in the body of the work are an invaluable feature."

From Prof. THOMAS EMERSON, Principal High-School, Woburn, Mass.

"Your Manual of General History has already been introduced into our High-School, and subjected to the only real test of the merits of a book—daily use in the class-room. It is the best compend of general history I have yet seen. In the general division of the subject in the choice, and arrangement of the details, in the clearness and simplicity of the language, in the omission of the endless and uninteresting minutiae with which many text-books on this subject are cumbered, you have been highly successful. Unlike most compendiums of history, the narrative is well connected and pleasing, thereby attracting rather than repelling the student. Nor are the maps among the least valuable features of the book. You have fully recognized the principle that the study of History and Geography should go hand in hand. It is extremely gratifying to find a book that furnishes the pupil with the leading facts of history in so attractive a manner, and leaves to the teacher so large an opportunity for oral instruction."

SCHOOL HISTORIES

BY

JOHN J. ANDERSON, A. M.

1. Introductory School History of the United States. Illustrated with maps. 195 pp. 16mo.

This work, though arranged on the catechetical plan, may be read as a continuous narrative, the text having been fully written before the questions were prepared. IT IS DESIGNED FOR CLASSES OF ADVANCED AS WELL AS LOWER GRADES, IN WHICH ONLY A VERY BRIEF OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF THE COUNTRY FROM ITS DISCOVERY TO THE PRESENT TIME IS TAUGHT.

2. Common School History of the United States. Illustrated with maps. 350 pp. 16mo.

This work is more catechetical than the preceding, since the answers are more independent of each other. DESIGNED FOR LARGE GRADED SCHOOLS.

3. Grammar School History of the United States. With one series of maps showing the location of the places referred to; and another, showing the progress of the country in its territorial acquisitions and political divisions. 252 pp. 16mo.

This work is on the narrative plan, with a set of questions for topical review at the end of the sections. IT WILL MEET ALL THE WANTS OF GRADED SCHOOLS AND ACADEMIES.

4. Pictorial School History of the United States. Fully illustrated with maps, portraits, vignettes, &c. 404 pp. 12mo.

This work is also on the narrative plan, but more circumstantial in its statements than the preceding. DESIGNED FOR HIGH-SCHOOLS AND ACADEMIES.

. Each of the above-named works contains the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States, with questions and explanations; and, in the Grammar School History, will also be found Washington's Farewell Address.

5. A Manual of General History. 419 pp. 12mo. Illustrated with maps, showing the changes in the political divisions of the world, and giving the location of important places. Various tables of chronology and contemporaneous events are also given, with a complete pronouncing index. DESIGNED FOR CLASSES OF ADVANCED GRADE.

6. A School History of England. 800 pp. 12mo. Illustrated with maps, showing the geographical changes in the country at different periods. Chronological and genealogical tables are given; also a complete pronouncing index. DESIGNED FOR CLASSES OF ADVANCED GRADE.

7. Anderson's Bloss's Ancient History. Illustrated with colored maps and a chart. 445 pp. 12mo. DESIGNED FOR CLASSES OF HIGH GRADE.

One of the leading aims in all of Anderson's Histories is to connect the geography with the chronology.

PREFACE.

THE object of this work is to supply to teachers and students a history of England containing the features of the author's popular school histories of the United States. Accordingly, the text has been made brief, but clear and explicit; questions have been appended at the foot of each page, to aid in study and recitation, and review questions added at the end of each section, for the purpose of practising the student in topical narration. Maps, showing the progressive changes in the political divisions of the country, and the location of the places referred to, are interspersed through the work, and chronological tables inserted at frequent intervals. The same system with regard to dates has been followed as is employed in the author's Manual of General History, they being inserted freely, but so as to form no essential part of the narrative. The pronunciation of proper names is also given wherever it was thought the student might need this information. The biographical and other references will, it is thought, be found a most convenient addition to a work of this kind. The size of the work has been dictated by a consideration of the limited time which, according to the present school requirements, can be given to this subject; and the author hopes that in this, as well as in other respects, it will meet the approval of those from whom his previous publications have received so generous a support and commendation.

I. THE BRITISH CONSTITUTION.....	279
II. GENERAL VIEW OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.....	283

INTRODUCTION.

I. GEOGRAPHY OF THE BRITISH ISLES.

1. THE British Isles lie between the 49th and 61st degrees of north latitude, and the 2d of east and the 11th of west longitude. The largest of these, Great Britain, comprising the three countries, England, Wales, and Scotland, contains nearly 90,000 square miles, or nearly twice the area of the State of New York. Its entire population in 1861 was about twenty-four millions. Ireland, lying to the west of Great Britain, contains about 32,500 square miles, and in 1861 had a population of about five millions eight hundred thousands.

2. These countries are now divided into counties, or shires, of which England has 40, Wales 12, Scotland 33, and Ireland 32. The Romans divided the island of Britain into five provinces: viz., 1. Britannia Prima, situated south of the Thames and the Severn rivers; 2. Britannia Secunda, now Wales (nearly); 3. Flavia Cæsariensis (Flavia Cæsarian province), situated to the north of the Thames, east of the Severn, and south of the Mersey and Humber rivers; 4. Maxima Cæsariensis (the great Cæsarian province), extending from the Mersey and the Humber as far as the wall of Adrian, or Severus; and Valentia (from the emperor Valens), situated between the wall of Adrian, or Severus, and the rampart of Agricola. The region to the north of Valentia was called Caledonia (from a word meaning people of the woods).

QUESTIONS.—1. How are the British Isles situated? What does Great Britain comprise? Its extent? Population? Extent and population of Ireland?

2. How are these countries divided? Roman divisions of Britain? Situation of each? Caledonia? Municipal towns? Colonies?

The municipal towns were Ebor'acum (York), and Verula'mium (St. Albans). There were nine colonies, the chief of which were Londinium (London), Aquæ Solis (Bath), Deva (Chester), and Lindum (Lincoln).

3. The first of these provinces became, after the Saxon conquest, Kent, Sussex, and Wessex; the second, North and South Wales; the third, Essex, Middlesex, East Anglia, and Mercia. East Anglia comprised Norfolk and Suffolk. The Great Cæsarian province became Northumbria, comprising Deira and Bernicia; and Valentia became Strathelyde, a British kingdom, and a part of the Saxon kingdom of Deira. Beyond the mainland of Scotland lie the Orkney Islands on the north, and the Hebrides on the west. These were scarcely known to the Romans, but in after time were occupied by the Northmen.

4. Ireland was never occupied by the Romans or Saxons; but before its conquest by the English was divided into the five kingdoms of Munster, Leinster, Meath, Ulster, and Connaught. Four of these names are still preserved as the designations of provinces. Munster occupies the south and southwest; Leinster, the east; Connaught, the west; and Ulster, the north. Ireland was anciently called I-er'ne, a word which, in the Celtic language, is supposed to mean west. The Romans called it Hibernia. Its present name is doubtless derived from its ancient appellation.

II. OLD-ENGLISH WORDS AND NAMES.

5. The Old-English, or Anglo-Saxon, language was essentially the same language as that now denominated the English language; but in the course of centuries it has, by

3. What did Britannia Prima comprise under the Saxons? Britannia Secunda? The Flavia Cæsarian Province? The Great Cæsarian Province? Valentia? What islands lie beyond? By whom were they occupied?

4. Ireland? Its ancient divisions? Modern provinces and their situation? Its ancient name? Roman name? Modern name?

5. Old-English language? How changed? Proper names?

degrees, been so changed that it cannot now be understood except by those who have specially studied it. Most of the proper names now used have a meaning which was very plain to those who employed them in former times, but which, at the present time, needs an explanation. In these names, we have representatives of the various tongues which have contributed to our modern English.

6. Thus, avon is Celtic for stream; strath for valley, as in Strathclyde; and pen for head, promontory, or hill, as in Pen Mon, the head of Mona Island. The Gaelic form of the latter (in Scotland) is ben, as in Ben Nevis. In words ending in caster, cester, and chester, derived from the word castra, a camp, we have the Latin element; as in Lancaster, Gloucester, Winchester, &c. Also in Stratton—Street-town, from strata, a street, and in Jersey, from Cæsare'a.

7. In the early history of England many names of persons are used, an explanation of the meaning of which will serve to enable the student more easily to remember them, besides increasing his interest in the history itself. Thus, Alfred is all-peace; Egbert, eye-bright; Bertha, the bright; Albert, all-bright; Elgiva,—corrupted from ælf-gifu, elf-gift; Ethelwolf, the noble wolf (ethel, æthel, or athel, noble); Eth'elred, noble in council; Ath'eling, son of a noble, or prince; Ath'elstan, precious stone; Edmund, a good protector; Edwin, good or prosperous in battle; Edward, a good guardian, &c.

III. LEGENDARY HISTORY OF BRITAIN.

8. The early history of Britain, as of most other countries, consists of stories or legends, of the truth of which no satisfactory evidence can be adduced. Previous to the account given by Cæsar, in his "Commentaries," of the inhabitants, nothing, as far as is known, was recorded of the events occurring among them. The Druids, indeed, prohibited such records as irreligious and unlawful. Therefore, as remarked by Milton, "from the first peopling of Britain to the coming of Julius Cæsar, there is nothing certainly known, either by tradition, history, or ancient fame."

9. The old chroniclers, however, and particularly Geoffrey of Monmouth, give the history of an almost uninterrupted series of events from the earliest ages down to the period of authentic history. According to these, the ancient inhabitants of the island, called Albion, were a race of giants, who, being greatly reduced in number by the fierce wars which they waged among themselves, were finally subdued and destroyed by Brutus, a Trojan prince, and a descendant of Æneas, who fled to Italy from the ruins of Troy.

10. This Brutus divided Albion, which he found in a waste condition, among his own people, and built a great city on the Thames River, which he called "New Troy." The time assigned for these events is the period of the Judges in Jewish history; and from that remote age, down to the coming of Cæsar, the long line of kings, descendants of Brutus, are given in this mythological history with great particularity, both as to dates and names. Among these was Bladud, who becoming a leper, and therefore being obliged to flee from his father's court, was cured by bathing in the hot springs of the Avon, where he afterward founded the city of Bath.

11. The son and successor of this king was Lear, whose story forms the foundation of one of Shakspeare's greatest tragedies. According to the legend, this king, in his old age, in order to be relieved from the care and labor of government, divided his dominions between his two daughters, Gon'eryl and Regan, discarding his youngest daughter Cordelia, because he thought she was wanting in affection for him, since her protestations of filial love were less vehement than those of her sisters. The latter, however, proved more sincere; for the too indulgent father having been treated with the basest ingratitude and unkindness by those whom he had endowed with his power and possessions, was finally compelled to seek a refuge with her whom he had disowned, and was by her and her husband, a Gaulish prince, restored to his throne. This reign is placed by the chroniclers in the sixth century before Christ.

12. Many years after this there reigned a king named Lud, who enlarged, and built walls around, the city of New Troy. After him it was called Caerlud, or Lud's Town, changed in course of time to London. Lud was a brave and warlike monarch, genial in disposition, and festive in his habits; and hence is represented as very popular. He was buried in a part of London, now called Ludgate. It was during the reign of his son, Cas-sib'e-laun, as it is said, that the invasion of Cæsar took place; and among his later descendants was Cu-nob'e-line, or Cymbeline (sim'be-line), whose history forms the foundation of another of Shakspeare's plays.

13. Such is the story of the Trojan kings of Britain, thoroughly believed in by many of the old writers, but evidently fictitious, being based, in part, upon names derived from a very different origin. The legend is, however, of very great antiquity. According to Sir Francis Palgrave, there is some reason to believe that the story of Brutus was invented by the bards, to gain favor with those who prided themselves on being descended from Æneas, the Trojan prince, and thus related to the kings of Rome. This, however, cannot be determined; but it is certainly more probable that the name of Britain gave rise to the story of Brutus than that the island received its ancient appellation from the name of that mythical prince.

14. This legendary history, although now set aside as fabulous and scarcely worthy of remark, did, in its own time, important service in the formation of the British character; and hence the people were wise in clinging as long as possible to their faith in these ennobling traditions. That proud ancestry, and the lofty achievements which were attributed, in the songs of the bards, to the early British race, inspired each succeeding generation with a love of brave exploits, a contempt of danger, and a lofty patriotism, which could only be crushed out after the nation had for centuries been trodden under the iron heel of the Roman invader.

15. An attachment to the legends of the past seems to be an almost universal sentiment among mankind. Those shadowy periods, so dim and vague from their distance, are the chosen theatre in which fancy delights to present her favorite characters and to enact her fondest dramas; and the charm with which these creations of the imagination are cherished, is the more powerful in proportion as they are contrasted with the sober and often repulsive scenes of real life and history. Hence, as remarked by a great historian, there are two distinct periods in the existence of every nation,—the age of historical faith and the age of historical reason.

14. Of what service was the legendary history? In what way was this influence exerted?

15. What leads to an attachment to the legends of the past? What two periods in a nation's history are referred to?

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

PART I. ANCIENT BRITAIN.

SECTION I.

BRITAIN UNDER THE ROMANS.

Extending from the Landing of Cæsar (55 B. C.) to the Invasion of the Saxons (449 A. D.)

1. THE southwestern shores of Britain were visited by Phœnician (fe-nish'e-an) and Carthaginian navigators many centuries previous to the Christian era, their chief object being to obtain a supply of tin from the extensive mines of that metal existing in the island. This is thought by some to be the origin of the name Britannia, or Britain, supposed to mean the "Land of Tin."* The more ancient name of the island was Albion, or the White Isle, from the chalk cliffs on its southern shore.

* Or, according to some, from the Celtic brîh, or brît, meaning painted; as the Britons were in the habit of painting or staining their bodies.

MAP QUESTIONS.—(Progressive Map, No. 1.) Into what five provinces were the Roman possessions divided? Where was Britannia Prima? Britannia Secunda? Flavia Cæsariensis? Maxima Cæsariensis? Valentia? What was the northern part of the island called? Where was the country of the Cantii (kan'she-i)? Of the Damno'ni? Of the Belgæ? Of the Ice'ni? Of the Silu'res? Of the Corita'ni? Of the Brigantes? Where was Londinium (London)? Eboracum (York)? Aquæ Solis (Bath)? Anderida (Pew'ensey)? Lindum (Lincoln)? Ra'tæ (Leicester)? Vernulamum (St. Albans)? What island near the southern shore of Britain? What islands between Britain and Hibernia (Ireland)? Where did Cæsar land? Where was the wall of Agricola? Of Adrian?

1. By whom was Britain visited? When? For what purpose? What is the origin of the name Britain? What more ancient name, and whence derived?

2. Its authentic history commences with the invasion by Julius Cæsar (55 B. C.), who, having made a conquest of Gaul, determined to carry his victorious arms against the bold islanders who had given important aid to his enemies, the Gauls. Accordingly, he crossed the channel, and with great difficulty effected a landing on the south-eastern shore (at Deal), being vigorously opposed by the Britons, who had assembled in large numbers to repel the invaders of their country. Roman skill and discipline, however, prevailed; and Cæsar, having gained a great victory over the rude forces of the Britons, made a temporary peace with them, and returned to Gaul.

3. In the spring of the next year, he made a second expedition to Britain with a fleet of eight hundred ships, carrying thither an army of more than 20,000 men. He landed at the same place as before, and marched into the country, being obstinately opposed by a British chieftain named Cas-wall'on (called by the Romans Cas-si-velaun'us), whom, however, he defeated in every battle. After he had penetrated into the country beyond the Thames, the Britons sued for peace, which Cæsar, wishing to return, granted on condition that a tribute should be paid to Rome. Notwithstanding his many victories, Cæsar on his departure had made no permanent conquest of any part of the island; and almost a century elapsed before any other attempt was made by the Romans to subdue it.

4. Manners, Customs, &c., of the Britons. The inhabitants of Britain had made at this time but little advancement in civilization; but the southeastern tribes were much superior in this respect to those of the other parts. They practised tillage with a certain rude skill, and built round huts of timber and reeds, resting on foundations of stone, and covered with a conical roof, in the centre of which was an aperture for the passage of smoke. Their habitations were frequently changed, either in hope of plunder, or in quest of better pasture for their flocks and herds. They wore very little clothing, notwithstanding the coldness of the climate, but painted or tattooed their bodies, using for the purpose a plant called woad, which yields a juice of a blue color.

5. Their arms consisted of a shield and javelins, and a sword. Their forces were mostly on foot; but they also fought on horseback, and in chariots with scythes and hooks affixed to the axles; and these they managed with wonderful dexterity. Their religion was a terrible superstition called Druidism; the priests, called Druids, being not only the ministers of religion, but judges, physicians, and teachers. They worshipped the sun and moon, fire, the serpent, and many other false deities; and among the rites which they practised, human sacrifice was quite frequent; immense figures, or cages, formed of osiers, being often filled with human beings, and then set on fire. The Druids were accustomed to live in caverns or amid the gloom of deep forests; and their veneration for the oak and mistletoe was quite remarkable.

6. One class of the Druids, called Bards, were poets and musicians. These attended the chieftains in their halls, and sang their praises; and in battle they cheered on their countrymen by their music on the harp. The various tribes of the Britons were each governed by a chieftain, but in times of great danger, they united for self-defence, and selected a commander-in-chief. At other times jealousies and animosities among neighboring tribes occasioned continual contests, so that war was the principal occupation, and military glory the chief object of ambition among all the people.

5. What arms did they use? How did they fight? What was their religion? What is said of the Druids?

6. What is said of the Bards? How were the Britons governed? What was their chief employment?

7. Renewed attempts of the Romans to Conquer the Britons. The civil wars in which the Romans were so long engaged prevented them from enforcing a fulfillment of the treaty which the vanquished Britons had made to Cæsar. It was contrary to the policy of Augustus to extend the territorial domain of the empire, and the same policy was observed by his immediate successors. Meanwhile, the Britons kept up their intercourse with Rome, sending some of their young men thither to be educated; and by this means improved their manners and habits. At length, the Emperor Claudius, instigated by a British exile, determined to undertake their subjugation (43 A. D.).

8. Accordingly, a considerable army was sent to Britain, under the command of Au'lus Plautius (plau'she-us); and although the Britons fought bravely for their liberty, they were defeated in many battles; so that when Claudius himself arrived, several of the tribes in the southeastern part of the island made submission to him. The other Britons, however, under a brave leader named Car'adoc, or Carac'tacus, still held out; until being defeated by a Roman general named Osto'rius, Caractacus was made a prisoner and carried to Rome (A. D. 51). His noble bearing, and the magnanimity which he displayed, excited the respect of his conquerors, and he was set at liberty.

9. Many of the western tribes still maintained a stubborn resistance, and for years baffled all the efforts of the invaders. In the reign of Nero, Suetonius (swe-to'ne-us) received the command of the Roman legion in Britain (A. D. 59); and finding that the hostility of the Britons was sustained through the influence of the Druids, he succeeded in reducing the island of Ang'lesey, which was their chief place of residence. Their altars were overturned, their sacred groves leveled with the ground, and many of the priests and priestesses were either massacred, or consumed in the flames of their burning shrines.

10. Meanwhile, the Britons of the eastern counties, exasperated by the wicked and tyrannical conduct of the Roman governor, revolted; and, led by their brave queen Boadicea (bo-ah-dis'e-ah), who, with her daughters, had been treated in the most ignominious manner, attacked and destroyed many of the Roman settlements. The principal of these was London, which Suetonius was compelled to abandon to the fury of its British assailants, by whom it was reduced to ashes. More than 70,000 Romans are said to have been slain by Boadicea's army. Defeated, however, after a long and fierce battle, by Suetonius, she terminated her life by taking poison (A. D. 62).

11. Several other generals were successively sent to Britain to carry on the work of subjugation; but it was not until Julius Agric'ola obtained the command (A. D. 78) that the Roman dominion was finally established in the island (A. D. 85). This able and excellent man, during the six-years of his administration, sought to make the Roman yoke easy to the conquered people. He encouraged agriculture, introduced the arts and sciences, as well as the study of the Latin language, improved the government, and thus gave to the rude Britons the benefit of Roman civilization. He extended his sway into the northern part of the island, called Caledonia, which was inhabited by a wild and very warlike people, over whom Agricola gained a great victory near the Gram'pian Hills.

12. The Caledonians, although defeated, were by no means subdued; and for many years afterward, continued to harass the Britons and their governors, having destroyed the fortifications (between the Forth and Clyde) which Agricola had erected to prevent their incursions. The emperor Adrian, after ineffectual efforts to subdue them, constructed an earthen rampart between the Tyne River and Solway Frith (A. D. 121). This was afterward called the "Picts' Wall," and considerable remains of it still exist. During the reign of his successor, Antoninus, the continued attacks of the northern tribes necessitated the construction of another chain of fortifications extending between the friths of Forth and Clyde (A. D. 140). Subsequently, the emperor Severus, after pursuing these fierce barbarians to their northern wilds, made a treaty with them; and on his return, constructed a solid wall of stone twelve feet high, along the line of Adrian's fortifications (A. D. 208). For more than seventy years after this, Britain remained comparatively undisturbed.

13. In the latter part of the third century, the eastern coasts were so much harassed by the attacks of Saxon pirates that the emperor Diocletian appointed a special officer to protect this part of the province. Carausius (ca-rau'she-us), who received this appointment, disowned his allegiance, and making an alliance with the Saxons, asserted for himself supreme authority in Britain (A. D. 286). He was, a few years afterward, assassinated, by his own officer, who in turn usurped the supreme power, but was defeated by the emperor Constantius (con-stan'she-us) (A. D. 296). This emperor died in York (A. D. 306); and there his son, Constantine the Great, was saluted emperor. This illustrious monarch was the son of a British princess, whom Constantius had married.

14. Under Constantine and his immediate successors, Britain enjoyed many years of tranquillity; the incursions of the barbarians were repressed, and commerce and the arts of peace were encouraged. But the northern tribes, now under the name of Scots and Picts, soon renewed their ravages. The former appear to have been a wild race from Ireland, which island for centuries bore the name of Scotia; while the Picts were probably a Caledonian tribe of British origin. During the reign of Valentinian I., these savage hordes penetrated as far as London, but were driven back by Theodosius, father of the great emperor of the same name (A. D. 368).

15. During the subsequent reigns, the Scots and Picts, although often vanquished by the Roman legions, continued to be a terror to the Britons, whose distresses were greatly increased by the withdrawal of the Roman armies, under Honorius, by whom they were needed to protect his dominions against the Goths. Some temporary assistance was supplied by Stilicho (stil'e-ko) (396 A. D.); and, at the earnest entreaty of the Britons, the island was once more visited by a Roman army (418 A. D.), on the occasion of a new inroad of the Scots and Picts. They, however, remained only long enough to repel the enemy, when the Romans took their final leave, after repairing the fortresses, and instructing the inhabitants in the means necessary for their defense.

16. Notwithstanding this, the Britons soon found themselves entirely unable to repel the incursions of the Scots and Picts, who took advantage of their unprotected state, and burnt and plundered worse than at any previous time. The attacks of the Saxons also added to their embarrassment and misery. In 446, the unhappy Britons made a most piteous appeal to their former conquerors to send them aid. They addressed a letter to the Roman patrician Aëtius (a-e'she-us), recounting their distresses, and bearing the inscription "the Groans of the Britons."

15. What other invasions were made by them? Why did the Romans leave Britain? Give an account of their last visit.

16. Describe the distresses of the Britons. What appeal did they make to the Romans?

“The barbarians,” they said, “on the one hand chase us into the sea; the sea on the other throws us back upon the barbarians; and we have only the hard choice left us of perishing by the sword or by the waves.”

17. Aëtius was, however, too much pressed by the Huns, under their terrific leader At'tila, to be able to afford them any aid; and, at length, in desperation, they formed an alliance with the piratical Saxons in order to repel their other enemies, the Scots and Picts, being guided, it is said, by the counsels of a powerful British prince, named Vor'ti-gern. The Saxon forces, under their leaders, Hen'ghist and Hor'sa, two brothers, landed on the island of Than'et, in accordance with this invitation, having readily agreed to the terms proposed by the Britons (A. D. 449). This event marks the close of Roman influence in the island, and the commencement of that of the Saxons.

18. Progress of Civilization. On the departure of the Romans, five centuries had elapsed since the landing of Cæsar, during about four of which a large part of the island had been under Roman dominion, and had assumed a condition of considerable prosperity. Agriculture and the useful arts had made so much progress, that considerable quantities of grain were exported to the other provinces of the empire, and British builders and artisans were in request on the continent. Roman towns, light-houses, roads, and bridges continued to exist for some time; and in many of the towns there were theatres, temples, and palaces. On the site of Westminster Abbey stood a temple of Apollo, and on that of St. Paul's Cathedral, a temple of Diana.

19. The country was not, however, completely Romanized; the people continued to speak their own language; and while the conquerors and their descendants occupied the towns, they alone possessing municipal privileges, the natives were generally peasants, occupying a rank in society but little above that of serfs. The country was divided into five provinces, each having its own ruler, and the whole was under the government of a Vica'rius, or Deputy, who resided at Eb-or'a-cum (York).

20. Christianity was introduced into Britain at an early period, probably during the second half of the second century. During the reign of Diocle'tian (-she-an), the British Christians suffered a severe persecution. The churches were razed, and many of the worshippers suffered torture and death,—among them, the proto-martyr St. Al'ban, long celebrated both in his own country and abroad. The Bible had been translated into the British tongue, and many of the ecclesiastics gained great fame for their learning and piety. The British Christians were represented in the Council at Arles (arl) by three bishops (A. D. 314); so that it is evident that Christianity had even then made considerable progress in the island.

20. When and how was Christianity introduced? What persecutions were suffered? What is said of St. Alban? What further of the British Christians?

SECTION II.

BRITAIN UNDER THE SAXONS.

Extending from the Landing of Henghist and Horsa (A. D. 449) to the Union of the Saxon Kingdoms under Egbert (A. D. 827).

1. With the aid of the Saxons under Henghist and Horsa, the Britons were enabled to drive back the Scots and Picts; and in return for the services thus rendered, the brothers were allowed to settle, with their companions, on the Isle of Thanet, where they were soon joined by others of their countrymen, whom they invited over. It is said that a beautiful daughter of Henghist, Rowe'na by name, captivated the British king, Vort'igern, and that, becoming his bride, she persuaded him to give up to her countrymen the whole of Kent. Whether this be true or not, it is certain that the Saxons soon began to encroach upon the lands of the Britons, and that their numbers were constantly augmented by new accessions from Germany.

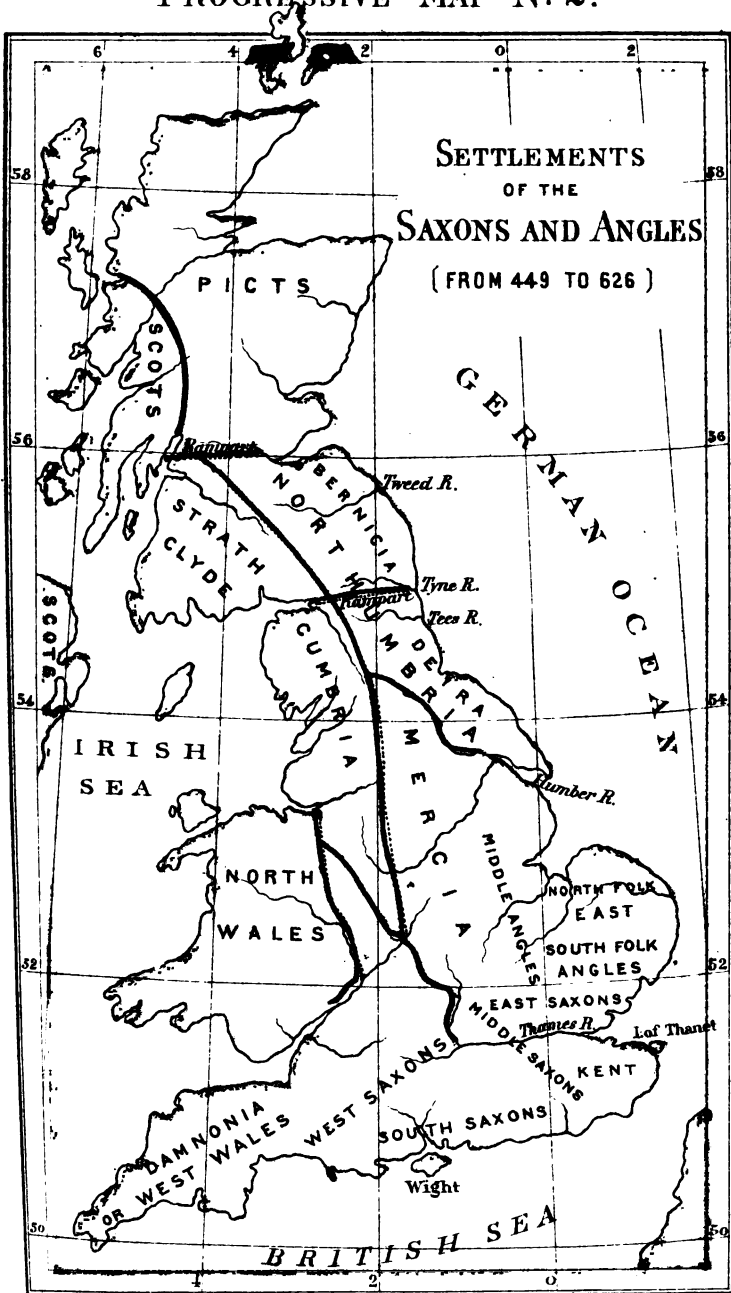

2. Fierce battles were fought between the forces of Henghist and Horsa and the Britons; in one of which Horsa was slain (A. D. 455). The Saxons were, however, generally victorious, and finally succeeded in completely securing their possessions in Kent, which thus became the first Saxon kingdom founded in the island. It remained a powerful state for more than a century afterward.

3. In the mean time, other bodies of Saxons arrived and settled in different parts of the island. Among these a kindred race, called Angles, came over, also from Germany, and made their home in such territories as they could wrest from the native inhabitants. They seem to have been a more numerous and energetic people even than the Saxons, as they occupied larger districts, and at length gave their name to the whole country.

4. By these invasions the following states were formed: 1. Kent; 2. Sussex, or the South Saxons; 3. Wessex, or the West Saxons; 4. Essex, or the East Saxons, including Middlesex, or the Middle Saxons; 5. East Anglia, formed by Angles, originally consisting of two tribes, North-folk and South-folk (hence, Norfolk and Suffolk); 6. Northumbria, that is, the country north of the Humber River, which at first consisted of two states, called in Latin De-ira and Bernicia; 7. Mercia, or the March, or boundary, being situated on the border of Deira and East Anglia. It was conquered by Anglian chieftains in the seventh century (A. D. 626). These seven states constituted what is known in history as the Saxon Heptarchy; although the number of independent Saxon kingdoms was at no time exactly seven.

5. The different Saxon kingdoms of the Heptarchy were almost incessantly engaged in fierce wars with one another. Their common enemies, the British, or Welsh, as they called them (meaning in their language foreigners), and the Scots, obliged them, however, to form some kind of alliance, and they usually acknowledged the sovereign of one of the states, supreme commander, or as they called him, Bret-wal-da, that is, Britain-wielder. Several of the Saxon monarchs held this office and title, the most distinguished of whom was Eth'elbert, King of Kent, who was Bretwalda for about fifty years.

6. During the period of these encroachments, comprehending about a century and a half, the British or Welsh made a stubborn but ineffectual resistance, and were driven into the western parts of the island, and formed several small states. In the southwest lay Damno'nia, or West Wales, founded by the famous King Arthur, whose exploits in connection with the legendary "Knights of the Round Table," have been so widely celebrated in poetry and song. In Cambria, or Wales, were several other states, and still others (Cum'bria and Strath Clyde) in the mountainous region to the north of Wales, so distinguished for its picturesque beauty. Others of the Britons crossed the Channel, and settled in Armor'ica, called afterward Bre-tagne', or Brit'tany. Still others probably remained interspersed among their conquerors in the condition of serfs.

7. These conquering Saxons and Angles, intermingled with whom were a people from Denmark, called Jutes, were at first pagan barbarians. The names of the days of the week still commemorate the deities which they adored. Thus Sunday and Monday (Sunnandaeg and Monandaeg) were the days sacred to the sun and moon; Tuesday, to Tuisco; Wednesday (Wodensdaeg), to Woden, or Odin, the god of war; Thursday, to Thor, the Thunderer, corresponding to Jupiter, among the Romans; Friday (Frey-adaeg), to Freya, the northern Venus; and Saturday, to Seator, a marine deity. They believed in the immortality of the soul, and indulged in the hope of a heaven, the chief delight of which was to intoxicate themselves with ale drunk from the skulls of their enemies slain in battle.

6. What became of the Welsh? What and where was Damnonia? By whom was it founded? What other Welsh states were there? What and where was Brittany?

7. What was the character of the Saxons, Angles, and Jutes? What do the names of the days of the week commemorate? What belief did these people entertain?

8. They possessed the most terrific courage and energy. No perils, however great, and no difficulties, however apparently insurmountable, were able to check their activity in any enterprise which they had undertaken. They trusted themselves in their rude and frail barks, without a compass, to the mercy of the winds and waves of the stormy ocean, fearless of shipwreck, eager to purchase booty at the peril of their lives. In the words of an old writer, "the storm is their protection when they are pursued by the enemy, and a cover for their operations when they meditate an attack. Before they quit their own shores, they devote to the altars of their gods the tenth part of the principal captives; and when they are on the point of returning, the lots are cast with an affectation of equity, and the impious vow is fulfilled."

9. Such was the character of the barbarous Saxons on their first invasion of Britain, but in the course of years it became greatly modified and softened. Christianity was first preached in the kingdom of Kent (A. D. 597), by St. Augustine, a Roman monk commissioned for the purpose by Pope Gregory the Great, who, it is said, was induced to do this by seeing some Anglian youths of remarkable beauty exposed for sale in the market-place of Rome. Struck with their fair complexion and blooming countenances, he inquired who they were; and being informed they were Angles, he remarked they might have been called Angels if they had been Christians; and some time afterward he resolved to undertake the conversion of a people whose name and personal appearance were so interesting.

10. St. Augustine was very kindly received by Ethelbert, King of Kent, who was already favorably disposed toward Christianity, having married a Christian princess;

8. What else is said of the character of the Saxons?

9. How was this character softened? When and by whom was Christianity first preached? What circumstance led to this?

10. Give an account of St. Augustine's mission and its results. What kingdoms embraced Christianity?

and the king becoming converted and being baptized (A. D. 597), great numbers followed his example. St. Augustine was made Archbishop of Canterbury; and soon afterward succeeded in introducing Christianity in Essex also, where a church dedicated to St. Paul was erected on the site of a temple of Diana, and one to St. Peter on a small island in the Thames. The latter is now Westminster Abbey. The other kingdoms, one after the other, also embraced the same faith.

11. The history of the various Saxon kingdoms which constituted the Heptarchy presents but little more than a continued scene of perfidy, treason, and murder. At last Egbert, King of Wessex, a descendant of Cerdic, the founder of that kingdom, triumphed over all his competitors, and obtained the control of the entire country (A. D. 827), to which was given the name of ENGLAND (Engla-land, i. e., Land of the Angles).

12. Two distinguished scholars flourished during the period of the Heptarchy;—Bede and Alcuin (al'kuin). The former, styled the "Venerable Bede," was educated in a monastery on the banks of the Tyne River, and is said to have been versed in all the learning that had survived the destruction of the Roman Empire. His chief literary work was the "Ecclesiastical History of the Angles." He died in the year 733. Alcuin was a native of York; and he acquired so extensive a reputation for learning, that students flocked to him from different parts of Europe. He was afterward invited to the court of Charlemagne (shar'le-mahn), where he spent the greater part of his life. His writings, which were in Latin, consisted chiefly of poems, scientific and theological essays, and letters to the distinguished personages of the age.

11. What is said of the history of these kingdoms? Which finally obtained the predominance? What is the origin of the name England?

12. What distinguished scholars flourished during this period? What is said of Bede? Of Alcuin?

13. The first Anglo-Saxon writer of note who composed in his own language, was Cædmon (ked'mon), whose works were poems on the Bible histories, and on other religious subjects. Many portions are still extant, and indicate considerable poetic genius and imagination. Cædmon died about 680. The first British historian was Gildas, born at Dumbarton about the beginning of the sixth century. He wrote during the time of the Saxon invasions, and in his "History of the Britons" fiercely inveighs against the barbarous invaders of his country. This work is written in Latin.

ENGLAND IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

SECTION I.

THE ANGLO-SAXON AND DANISH KINGS.

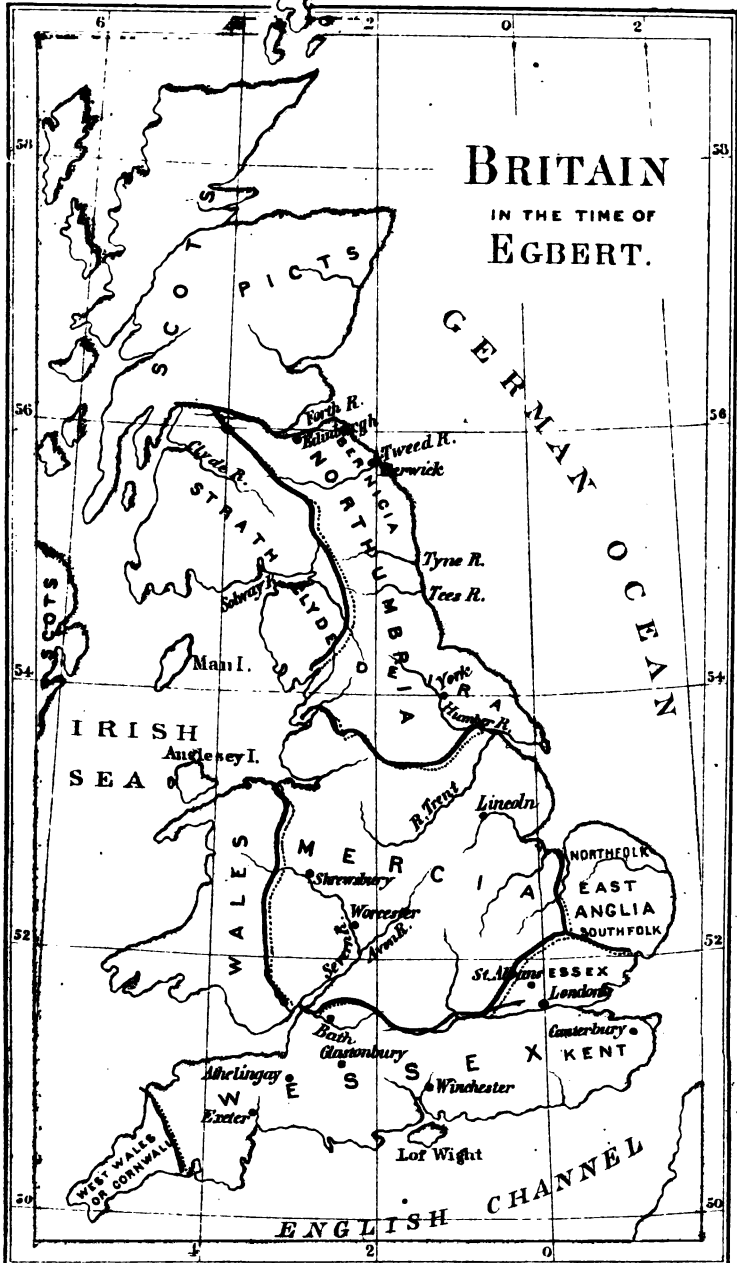

Extending from the Foundation of the English Monarchy under Egbert (A. D. 827) to the reign of William the Conqueror (A. D. 1066).

1. Egbert and his immediate successors styled themselves "Kings of Wessex;" since it was that kingdom which absorbed into itself all the smaller states in the south, and finally succeeded in making tributary to itself the larger kingdoms of Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumbria. These kingdoms continued for some time to be ruled by their own monarchs, and governed by their own laws. The sway of Egbert, however, extended over the whole of Roman Britain except Cumbria and Strathclyde; for he had waged repeated wars with the Welsh, both in North and West Wales, and defeated them in so many great battles, that nearly all submitted to his power.

2. But a dreadful peril now confronted his newly-founded kingdom. This was an invasion by a fierce and barbarous people called, in the English chronicles, the Danes. They were Northmen, inhabitants of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, who in the previous century (787 A. D.) had commenced their ravages, landing on the coast, plundering and killing the inhabitants, laying waste their lands, and burning their habitations. England was more particularly exposed to the attacks of the Danes, and Scotland to those of the Norwegians.

3. At first, these piratical marauders only landed for booty, and when this was obtained, retired to their ships; but, during the last few years of Egbert's reign, they came as conquerors, and showed a fierce determination to settle in the lands from which they had driven the inhabitants. Thus the Anglo-Saxons were now threatened with the same calamities which their ancestors had inflicted on the wretched Britons; for the Danes of this century were similar in race and character to the Saxons three or four centuries earlier.

4. They plundered, massacred, and devastated, with the same merciless ferocity, the terrified inhabitants fleeing from them, as from the vengeance of Heaven. Their blood-red flag bore the figure of a black raven; and when, as the banner waved in the breeze, the bird seemed to flutter its wings, they hailed it as the sure harbinger of victory. Their swords and battle-axes were ponderous and formidable weapons. Egbert was at first vanquished by these fierce invaders, but subsequently gained a great victory over them, although they had formed an alliance with the revolted Welsh in Cornwall (835). The next year he died, and the government was bestowed upon his son Eth'el-wolf (836).

2. What peril confronted the new kingdom? Who were the Danes?

3. What was the object of their invasions?

4. What is said of their mode of attack? Their banner and weapons? What did Egbert accomplish? When did he die? Who was his successor?

5. Ethelwolf possessed but little of the energy and talent of his father, being more disposed to religious exercises than to the active duties of a king. He began his reign by delivering to his eldest son the provinces of Kent, Essex, and Sussex. The Danes made constant incursions during the whole of this reign, keeping the people everywhere in constant alarm; and though they were sometimes repulsed, they always succeeded in ravaging the country and carrying off the spoil. Having effected a settlement on the Isle of Thanet, they advanced against London and Canterbury, both of which places they burnt. Ethelwolf, roused by the danger, marched against them, and defeated them in a bloody battle. They, however, still maintained their settlement, but removed from Thanet to the Isle of Shep'ey, nearer London.

6. Notwithstanding these troubles, Ethelwolf went on a pilgrimage to Rome, taking with him his youngest son, Alfred, then six years old (855). He spent a year there, occupied in exercises of devotion, and distinguished himself by his acts of liberality to the church. On his return he visited Charles the Bald, of France, and married Judith, his daughter. During his absence, his eldest son had died; and Eth'el-bald, his second son, conspired with many of the nobles to exclude him from the throne. Ethelwolf, however, to avoid the calamities of a civil war, yielded to his son the western half of the kingdom. He died soon after, in 858.

7. Ethelbald and Ethelbert. On the death of his father, Ethelbald retained the western part of the kingdom, but the eastern portion was left to his brother Ethelbert. The latter, in 860, by the death of Ethelbald, became ruler over the whole; but his reign lasted only six years.

5. What was Ethelwolf's character? How did he begin his reign? What is said of the Danes?

6. Describe Ethelwolf's pilgrimage. What occurred during his absence? His death?

7. Describe the reigns of Ethelbald and Ethelbert. When did Ethelred ascend the throne? What is said of the Danes? Of Edmund? Death of Ethelred? By whom was he succeeded?

Ethelred, his brother, succeeded him (866). The continued and harassing incursions of the Danes occupied these three reigns. These invaders penetrated into the kingdom of Northumbria, seized the city of York, and then passed into Mercia, where they took up their quarters for the winter (870). Expelled thence by Ethelred, they invaded East Anglia, and seizing Edmund, its king, barbarously put him to death, for refusing to renounce his faith. On this account, Edmund was afterward canonized as a saint and martyr. Ethelred died of a wound received in a battle with the Danes, and was succeeded by his brother Alfred (871).

8. Alfred was only twenty-two years of age when he ascended the throne, but he had already given indications of the virtues and talents which afterward so greatly distinguished him. In several actions with the Danes, he had shown a martial skill and courage far beyond his years; and he had diligently cultivated his mind by the study of authors not only in the Anglo-Saxon, but in the Latin language. Indeed, he took so much pleasure in literary pursuits, that he undertook the government of the kingdom with regret rather than with eagerness; but the will of his father and the general voice of his countrymen forbade that he should decline it.

9. The Danes poured into the kingdom in ever-increasing numbers, and committed the most dreadful ravages. Mercia was desolated with fire and sword; and its last king, fleeing in dismay, took refuge in a Roman cloister. Alfred was constantly in arms against the enemy, in one year fighting with them, it is said, as many as eight battles. Pushed to the utmost extremity, they were glad to come to terms, and promised to settle quietly in such parts of the country as might be assigned them. But no treaties could bind them; and new swarms arriving, and their ravages being again commenced, the wretched Saxons yielded to despair, some fleeing to Wales, and others quitting the island altogether. The king could therefore collect no forces to oppose the invaders (878).

10. In this dreadful extremity, Alfred displayed the true greatness of his character. Although compelled to give up all that pertains to a king, and to take refuge in a peasant's rude hut, he was far from resigning himself to indolent despair. Collecting some of his retainers, he took up a position in a marsh in Somersetshire,* secure on account of the unknown and almost inaccessible roads by which it was approached, and thence made frequent sallies upon the Danes. One of his earls, in another part of the country, was so successful, that he put the enemy to rout with great slaughter, and captured their famous red flag with the black raven, in which they so much trusted.

11. These successes again inspired the English with confidence, and they rallied around their noble king; but he would not risk an engagement with the Danes without having certain information of their numbers and condition. To obtain this knowledge, he, in the disguise of a glee-man, or harper, entered the Danish camp, and passed unsuspected through every part of it, being introduced to the Danish prince Guth'rum, whom he greatly entertained with his songs and merry jokes. Soon after this, he made a vigorous attack upon the enemy, and so signally routed them that Guthrum was glad to accept any terms of peace.

12. Alfred not only gave them their lives, but formed a plan for converting them into useful subjects. East Anglia and Northumbria being laid waste by the ravages of their countrymen, he proposed to Guthrum and his followers to form permanent settlements there, thinking that in this way he should erect a rampart against other incursions. The proposal was accepted, and Guthrum, with several of his officers, was admitted to baptism,—Alfred having insisted that they should declare themselves Christians, as a pledge of their submission (878). He afterward ceded the eastern part of Mercia to them, and these districts continued to form a Danish state (called Danelagh) for many years afterward, its chief boundary being the old Roman road called Watling-street, which ran from London across England to the Irish Channel.

13. A period of tranquillity ensued, which Alfred improved by rebuilding the ruined cities, particularly London; restoring order to the government, and putting the kingdom in a position of defence against future assaults. For this purpose he established a regular militia in every part of the country, so that it might be ready at any time to repel an invasion without leaving other parts defenceless. He also constructed a fleet, and stationed vessels at proper points of the coast, so as to be able to meet the piratical Danes and Norwegians on their own element. In this way he preserved his kingdom in a state of peace and quietude for several years.

14. At length, however, the Danes, under a famous leader, named Hastings, came with a powerful fleet from France, and landed on the coast of Kent (893). A long war ensued, in which Alfred displayed his characteristic skill and vigor. The pirates were at last entirely subdued, and compelled to quit the country, or were dispersed among their countrymen in Northumbria and East Anglia. The king survived this victory but a few years, dying after a glorious reign of nearly thirty years (901), in which his achievements, and the virtues and talents which he displayed in every circumstance of his life, justly won for him the title of "Alfred the Great."

15. It was not only by his military achievements and statesmanship that Alfred was a benefactor to his people. He endeavored to rescue them from the gross ignorance and barbarism in which he found them at his accession. He translated many interesting and useful works from Latin into Anglo-Saxon, established schools for the instruction of the people, founded, or at least repaired, the University of Oxford, and invited into the kingdom scholars from various parts of Europe. He introduced and encouraged manufactures, offered rewards for useful inventions, and actively promoted navigation and commerce. His great reputation as a monarch has, however, caused him to be considered the founder of many institutions which had existed among the Anglo-Saxons before his time, and which he only restored or enforced. His peculiar merit, indeed, was not so much that of a lawgiver, as of a wise and energetic administrator of government, and an earnest patron of whatever promised to promote the good of his people.

16. Edward the Elder. Alfred was succeeded by his second son Edward,* who inherited the energy and military talents of his father, but without his genius for science and literature. His claim to the throne was disputed by his nephew Ethelwold, who, in order to gain the object of his ambition, formed an alliance with the Danes in Northumbria and East Anglia, whom he stirred up to revolt. Edward, however, soon subdued the rebellion, and in one of the battles Ethelwold was slain. The remainder of this reign is occupied with contests carried on with the Danish settlers and their countrymen, who invaded England from Normandy and Brittany.

17. Edward was generally victorious in his various engagements with the enemy, and finally reduced them to submission. He thus acquired the dominion of Northumbria and East Anglia, and subsequently also of Mercia. The Welsh in Strathclyde also became tributary to him; and even the Scots, who had some years previously subdued the Picts, were obliged to yield him submission. In these military achievements and conquests he was greatly assisted by his heroic sister Ethelfle'da, widow of the Earl of Mercia. Edward was thus the first king of the West-Saxons whose sway extended over all Britain, he being now the only English king, and the other kings and princes in the island being his vassals. His death soon followed these great accessions of power (925).

18. Athelstan, son of Edward the Elder, was the successor of that king. Like his father and grandfather, he possessed great energy of character, and was not only an able general, but a wise and liberal-minded monarch. He subdued a revolt in Northumbria, and in a great battle defeated the Welsh, Scots, and Danes, who had entered into a league to destroy his power (937). This victory gave tranquillity to the country during the remainder of his reign, which lasted till 941. In order to encourage commerce and navigation, Athelstan enacted the singular law that any merchant who had made three long sea voyages on his own account should be admitted to the rank of thane, or gentleman.

19. Edmund, the brother of Athelstan, was only eighteen years old when he was made king; but he showed considerable vigor and talent in his expeditions against the revolted Northumbrians and North Welsh. His reign was brought to a close in a very singular manner. Noticing, on the occasion of a festival, the presence of Leolf, a notorious robber, whom he had previously banished, he ordered him to leave the hall; and enraged at his refusal to obey, he leaped on him and seized him by the hair. The ruffian thereupon drew his dagger, and inflicted upon Edmund a wound of which he immediately expired (946).

20. Edred, the brother of Edmund, succeeded him on the throne. The Danes in Northumbria again rebelled, and were again subdued; and the king, in order to prevent future revolts, appointed over this district an English governor, and placed garrisons in the principal towns. Edred was greatly influenced, in both religious and temporal affairs, by the famous Dunstan (commonly called St. Dunstan), abbot of Glastonbury, whom he raised to the highest offices, and who possessed among the people a very great reputation for sanctity and learning. Edred's death happened in 955, when he was succeeded by his nephew Edwy, eldest son of Edmund.

21. Edwy. The reign of this king was short and troubled. He opposed Dunstan in the measures by which he wished to reform the vices of the secular clergy (those who were not monks), and incurred the displeasure of the Church by marrying his cousin Elgiva (el'je-vah), of whom he was so fond that he left the banquet given in honor of his coronation, to enjoy her society and that of her mother. This was deemed an insult by Dunstan and his associates, and they compelled his return to the banquet-hall. Edwy, in resentment for this act, brought a charge of embezzlement against Dunstan, and obliged him to flee the kingdom. He was, however, recalled by the revolted Mercians, who had declared in favor of the king's brother Edgar; and it is said that Elgiva, having been compelled to leave her husband, was hastening again to him, when she was seized by the Mercians and most cruelly put to death. Edwy died a short time afterward, and was succeeded by Edgar (959).

22. Edgar, who was only sixteen years old when he commenced to reign, showed very great deference to Dunstan, favored all his measures to reform the Church, and in a short time promoted him to be Archbishop of Canterbury. His reign was entirely peaceful, being undisturbed by either foreign or domestic enemies. Edgar, however, kept up a constant preparation for hostilities, and every year sailed around the island with an immense fleet, so as to intimidate the Welsh, Scots, and Danes. His coronation took place at Bath, thirteen years after his accession; and afterward proceeding to Chester, he caused his barge to be rowed down the Dee by eight tributary kings.

23. Although a most efficient monarch, Edgar's character in private life is said, by some of the early historians, to have been exceedingly licentious; but there is no doubt that the accounts given of his cruelty and criminal excesses are the exaggerations or inventions of his enemies. Such is probably the story told of his marriage with Elfrida, after assassinating her husband; and of his breaking into a convent, and carrying off a nun by violence. Edgar favored the monastic party in opposition to that of the secular clergy; and therefore he has been unduly praised or too severely censured, according to the sympathies of different historians. He almost extirpated the wolves which infested some parts of the kingdom, by requiring the Welsh princes to pay, instead of money, an annual tribute of three hundred heads of these animals. The reputation of this king attracted many foreigners to his court, and he was on excellent terms with contemporary princes, particularly with Otho of Germany, who had married his aunt Edith. He was succeeded by his son Edward (975).

24. Edward the Martyr was but fifteen years of age when the council of the nation called him to the throne. He was opposed by his step-mother Elfrida, who desired that her own son Ethelred, seven years old, should be elected in his stead; but the influence of Dunstan prevailed against her. The contests between the two parties in the Church were continued during this reign, and several synods were called to settle the differences; but the monastic party under Dunstan had the advantage. Edward was assassinated, it is said, through the instigation of Elfrida, in 978, and hence has received the title of "Martyr." Ethelred, his half-brother, succeeded him.

25. Ethelred II. was a mere boy, only ten years old, when he became king. Dunstan crowned him with reluctance, and foretold that his reign would be a most unhappy one, knowing probably that the kingdom had come to him through the wickedness of his mother. During the rest of this prelate's life, his influence and counsels in some degree protected England from the serious disasters which threatened it; for the Danes had again commenced their invasions.* In 991, a short time after Dunstan's death, an immense force of Norwegians, under several leaders, one of whom, Olaf or Anlaf, was afterward a very famous king of Norway, arrived in England, and committed so many ravages that the king, in despair of driving them away, consented to pay them a large sum of money (£10,000) on condition that they would depart.

* Dunstan's death occurred in 988, at the age of 63. He first came into notice in the reign of Athelstan; and hence was a distinguished personage during seven reigns. He was a very extraordinary man, being versed in music, painting, and other arts; an adroit politician and statesman; and as a churchman and prelate held in the highest repute for his talents and piety. His determined efforts to benefit his party and establish his policy in the Church have made his character and conduct the subject of very severe invective with writers opposed to him. He was afterward canonised, and hence is known in history under the appellation of St. Dunstan.

25. What is said of Ethelred? Of Dunstan? Of the Norwegians? How were they induced to depart?

26. This expedient proved ineffectual, for the invasions were constantly renewed with the hope not only of plunder but of payment. Olaf, now king of Norway, and Sweyn (swane), king of Denmark, joined their forces, and made repeated invasions, spreading havoc and ruin wherever they appeared (994). Ethelred, never manifesting either vigor or prudence, bought them off at first with the sum of £16,000, afterward with £24,000, in order to pay which he was compelled to levy upon the people a tax, called Danegeld, or Dane-money. Olaf retired, and afterward embracing Christianity, made no renewal of these incursions.

27. Sweyn and his countrymen, however, persevered in their hostility, hoping finally to effect the conquest of the whole country; and Ethelred was incapable of making any effectual opposition against the ravages committed by these savage and daring intruders. Thinking to strengthen his influence, he entered into an alliance with Richard II., Duke of Normandy, and married his daughter Emma (1001); but the Danes still continued their hostilities, and could only be checked by a compliance with their demands for money.

28. A very cruel and unwise scheme of the king's still farther added to his misfortunes and those of his kingdom. On the departure of Sweyn, Ethelred gave secret orders that all the Danes (probably all the foreign Danes, or those whom Sweyn had left) should be massacred, on the festival of St. Brice (November 13th, 1002). This was done with every circumstance of ferocity, neither sex nor age being spared; and Sweyn's own sister, with her husband and children, were among the victims.

29. The next year, the Danish king appeared off the western coast, and took a deep revenge for the murder of his countrymen; and a constant and most destructive war was waged for several years, the English all the time making fruitless efforts to defend themselves and their country, but receiving no effectual aid from their imbecile king, whose only expedient was to bribe the Danes for a brief and precarious peace. At length, Sweyn being virtually king of England, having received the submission of most of the English nobles, Ethelred fled into Normandy (1013).

30. A ray of hope, however, soon dawned again upon the English, for their monarch had been absent scarcely six weeks when the conqueror died, leaving the English throne to his son Ca-nute, who had accompanied him in his expeditions. Ethelred was invited back by his former subjects, and returned in 1014, with his brave and stalwart son Edmund, afterward called Ironsides, who fought against the Danes; and Canute was for a time obliged to flee.

31. But the next year he returned with a large force; and, notwithstanding the efforts made by Edmund, who was unsupported by his father, soon overcame all opposition, and compelled the greater part of the nation to submit to his authority. Ethelred and Edmund were shut up in London, and thither Canute was directing his course when the king died, thus being saved from an inglorious capture and imprisonment (1016). Few kings have manifested so much weakness and incapacity, or have been so little adapted to the circumstances in which they were placed, as Ethelred. Always doing what he should not have done, and leaving undone what it was most necessary to do, he well deserved the appellation, bestowed by Dunstan upon him, of "Ethelred the Unready;" that is, without rede, or counsel.

his son Edmund was proclaimed king by the citizens of London and some of the nobles who still remained faithful to the cause of the English sovereign. The others took an oath of allegiance to Canute. A war ensued, in which several fierce battles were fought; and the English under Edmund, who was a skilful and valiant soldier, gained some decided victories. At last, however, it was thought best to make a compromise, and Canute agreed to receive Northumbria, Mercia, and East Anglia for his portion of the kingdom, and to resign to Edmund the remainder, comprising the southern part of the country, with the city of London. About one month afterward, Edmund was murdered, through the contrivance of Edric, Duke of Mercia (1016).

DANISH KINGS.

33. Canute, on the death of Edmund, was crowned king of all England. Reserving to himself the administration of Wessex, he appointed Thurkill earl of East Anglia, Eric, earl of Northumbria, and Edric, of Mercia, in reward for their services in obtaining for him the English throne. The two sons of Edmund, then quite young, he sent to Olaf, king of Sweden, with the request that they should be put to death. But Olaf refusing compliance, sent them into Hungary, where they were protected and educated. Edward, the younger, was afterward married to the daughter of the emperor Henry II.

34. In order to reward his Danish followers, Canute was at first compelled to load the people with heavy taxes; but after he was settled on the throne, he adopted such measures as would reconcile the English to his government. He sent away as many of his countrymen as he could spare, made no distinction between Dane and English in administering justice, restored the Saxon customs in a general assembly of the states, and took care to protect the lives and property of all his subjects.

35. The two sons of Ethelred, then living with their uncle Richard, Duke of Normandy, gave Canute considerable anxiety, as being heirs to the English throne. He accordingly paid his addresses to their mother, Emma, who consented to be his wife, and thus, a second time, became queen of England. Having, in this way, disposed of all opposition, he reigned with mildness as well as wisdom; and to atone for the wickedness of his former acts, built churches, founded monasteries, and even went on a pilgrimage to Rome (1027).

36. A story is told by some of the early historians which illustrates his good sense as well as his piety. Walking on the sea-shore, on one occasion, with his courtiers, he became very much disgusted with their flatteries; and to rebuke their folly, commanded that his chair should be set at the edge of the water, while the tide was rapidly advancing, so that he might compel the rude waves to retire from his dominions. But, of course, the billows heeded not his kingly commands, but soon dashed violently against his person; whereupon he called upon his servile flatterers to remark how feeble was the sway of the mightiest earthly king in comparison with the "King of kings," who alone deserves the adoration of mankind.

37. This humility of Canute was the more praiseworthy, as he was one of the most powerful monarchs of his time, being sovereign of Denmark and Norway as well as of England. In the latter part of his reign, he led an expedition against Malcolm, King of Scotland, who had refused to acknowledge himself a vassal for Cumberland, to the English crown; and soon reduced him to submission (1031). He died a few years afterward (1035), leaving three sons, Har'dicanute, by his wife Emma, and Sweyn and Harold, by his former marriage. Hardicanute was in possession of Denmark; Sweyn was crowned King of Norway; and Harold succeeded to the English throne.

38. Harold obtained the throne after considerable opposition. Queen Emma desired that her son Hardicanute should be made king, and in this was supported by the West Saxons, led by their great earl Godwin, who exerted a powerful influence at this time, and for some years afterward. Civil war was threatened; but it was averted by a compromise, Harold being accepted as the sovereign of all the English territories north of the Thames, and Hardicanute of those south of it; and as the latter was in Denmark, the government of his portion was left to Queen Emma and Earl Godwin. Hardicanute, however, neglected to assume the administration, and the people, tired of waiting for him, finally chose Harold to be king of all England (1037).

39. Godwin was afterward gained over by Harold to his interest; for when Alfred and Edward, the two sons of Emma by King Ethelred, arrived in England from Normandy on a visit to their mother, Godwin, with the connivance of the king, laid a plan for their destruction; and one of them (Alfred) being seized by the king's servants, was put to death. Emma, with her other son, then fled the kingdom. This is the only act by which we are enabled to form a judgment of the character of Harold. His agility in running and walking gained for him the appellation of Harefoot. He died after a very brief reign, little regretted by his subjects, and thus left the succession open to his brother Hardicanute (1040).

38. What opposition was made to Harold? Who supported Hardicanute? What compromise was made? Why was it not carried out?

39. How were Ethelred's sons treated? What was Harold styled? Why? His death? His successor?

40. Hardicanute was preparing to make a descent upon England, to recover from Harold, by force of arms, his share of the kingdom, when he heard of the king's death. He immediately sailed to London, where he was received in triumph, and acknowledged king. Enraged at Harold for the murder of his brother, he caused his remains to be exhumed, and thrown into a fen; but Godwin, who was accused of being an accomplice in the murder, was released, after taking the oath of compurgation.* He also conciliated the king by the present of a large ship splendidly equipped, and manned by fourscore men, magnificently armed.

41. Hardicanute soon became very unpopular by his reckless and oppressive measures. Among the latter was the renewal of the imposition of Danegeld, to pay the expenses of the fleet which brought him from Denmark. The people of Worcester having risen against the tax-gathers, he caused the city to be pillaged by the soldiers, and burnt to the ground. His reign, however, was very short; his death occurring two years after his accession, at the nuptial banquet of one of the Danish lords (1042). He derived his name Hardicanute from his robust constitution, which, however, he prematurely impaired by his habits of intemperance.

SAXON KINGS RESTORED.

42. Edward the Confessor. The opportunity offered to the English, by the death of Hardicanute, to throw off the Danish yoke, was eagerly seized by them; and Edward, brother of Edmund Ironside, was at once elected king. Earl Godwin, who had vigorously supported his claims to the throne, became his chief adviser; and Edith, the earl's daughter, was married to the king (1045). One of the first acts of Edward was to strip his mother Emma of the immense treasures which she had amassed; her neglect of himself and of his brother Alfred during their adverse fortune, having extinguished in his mind all filial affection or respect toward her. She was afterward kept in confinement at Winchester.

43. Edward having been educated in Normandy, at the court of his grandfather, had acquired a very great fondness for Norman society and manners; and he soon disgusted his English subjects by the large number of his Norman followers, whom he had invited over, and appointed to offices of dignity and importance, even the see of Canterbury being given to a Norman. He had also contracted a very intimate friendship with his cousin William, the present duke of Normandy. Thus the language, customs, and laws of that country soon became quite fashionable in England.

44. These proceedings were particularly offensive to Earl Godwin, whose influence and authority had been second only to the king; the government of a large part of England having been committed to him and his sons Sweyn and Harold. Siward, the great Danish earl of Northumbria, and Leofric, earl of Mercia, were the most powerful of the English nobles, next to Godwin. A quarrel with the Normans soon occurred (1051). Eustace, count of Boulogne (boo-lone'), was on his return from a visit to the king, and at Dover had committed an act of violence against one of the inhabitants. The latter at once rose against the foreigners, and drove them from the place, some of them being killed. The count having complained to the king, the latter ordered Godwin to inflict severe punishment upon the people of Dover; but he, throwing all the blame upon the Normans, refused to obey the royal mandate, and summoned his forces to resist it.

45. Deserted, however, by the other nobles, he, with his sons, was compelled to flee; and all his estates were confiscated (1051). But the next year he succeeded in collecting a large fleet; and sailing to London, was received with so much enthusiasm by the people, that Edward was obliged to yield, and Godwin and his sons (except Sweyn, who had been outlawed) were restored to their honors and possessions. The death of Godwin occurring soon after, Harold succeeded to his dignity and influence; and by his modesty and affability acquired, in a short time, the goodwill of the king, very greatly increasing, in the same way, the number of his friends and partisans.

46. Edward having no children, sent to Hungary for Edward, called "the Outlaw," son of Edmund Ironside, in order to make him his successor; but this prince died a short time after his arrival in England, leaving a young son, named Edgar. William of Normandy had visited his cousin Edward, and had been induced to aspire to the English throne, claiming that Edward had promised to bequeath it to him. But the people of England were too much attached to their great and good earl Harold, voluntarily to permit a foreigner to rule over them; and all looked upon him as their future sovereign.

47. William, therefore, feared Harold very much, as a rival; and once, when the latter was on a visit to his court, he was compelled by the Norman duke to take an oath that he would sustain his claim to the throne; and, to make the pledge more solemn, William secretly placed under the altar, on which Harold swore, the sacred relics of some of the most revered martyrs, which, after the oath had been taken, were shown him. But on his return, he regarded not the oath, it having been extorted from him by violence.

48. Harold was successful in an important expedition against the Welsh; and was also despatched to reduce the Northumbrians to submission, who had revolted against the government of his brother Tostig. Finding, however, that Tostig had ruled with injustice and oppression, he abandoned his cause, and yielded to the people the ruler whom they had elected in his place. Tostig, therefore, greatly enraged against his brother, departed the kingdom, and took refuge in Flanders. A short time after this Edward died (January 5th, 1066), having, it is said, recommended the council to choose Harold as his successor. He was buried in Westminster Abbey,* which had been consecrated only a few days previously.

49. This reign was prosperous and peaceful, not from any ability displayed by the monarch, but on account of the circumstances in which he was placed. The Danes had ceased their incursions; and the troubles with the Welsh were soon extinguished by the energy and talent of Godwin and his son Harold. The virtues of Edward were rather those of the cloister than the court. He was pious and beneficent, and earnestly endeavored to administer justice with impartiality, for which purpose he caused a very useful body of laws to be compiled. He was the first to touch for the scrofula (called the King's Evil); and for seven centuries those afflicted with that disease were, at times, presented to the English monarchs to be cured in this way. About a century after his death, Edward was canonized by the Pope, with the surname of "the Confessor." He was the last of the royal Saxon line; but not the last of the Saxon kings, since the Saxon noble Harold succeeded him.

50. Harold II. Edgar Atheling, son of Edward the Outlaw, was the only surviving male of the royal line; but he was considered by the council too young to occupy the throne; and consequently Harold, son of Earl Godwin, was elected king, and crowned in Westminster, on the very day of king Edward's burial. William of Normandy was very indignant when he received the news of this election, and sent an embassy to England to remind Harold of his oath, and to demand that he should at once resign the crown in his favor. This being refused, he immediately prepared to make good his claim by force of arms. Harold had also to contend against his brother Tostig, who sought, with the aid of Harold Hardrada, king of Norway, to regain his power, and with a large army invaded the north of England. Harold met the allied forces at Stamford Bridge, and defeated them with great loss, both Tostig and the Norwegian monarch being slain (September 25th, 1066).

51. Scarcely had he time to rejoice over this great victory, when he received the intelligence that William had landed with a large and splendidly equipped army on the southern shore. With his accustomed energy and promptitude, he hastened by rapid marches to oppose this formidable invader; but on a near approach to the enemy, found his forces much reduced by desertion, many being disaffected on account of an unsatisfactory distribution of the Norwegian spoils, and others discouraged by superstitious forebodings of defeat, on account of the solemn oath which Harold had violated, and for which he had been excommunicated by the pope.

52. On this account Harold's brother, Gurth, endeavored to dissuade him from engaging with the enemy, urging the policy of wearing out William's forces by delay; but Harold was too eager for battle, and too confident of victory to listen to this advice. The spot on which this important conflict occurred was called Senlac (now Battle), nine miles from Hastings,—the place at which William had landed. Harold posted his men advantageously to receive the onset of the Normans, who advanced singing the “song of Roland;” and for nine hours the battle raged with the utmost fury, both leaders displaying the greatest skill and valor. At last the brave Harold fell,* pierced in the eye with an arrow; and the English fled, leaving the Normans in possession of the field (October 14th, 1066).

53. Harold's two brothers were also among the slain, and with them likewise perished nearly all the nobility of the south of England. Harold's body was found with great difficulty, and was at first buried on the sea-shore; but subsequently, it was disinterred, and by permission of the conqueror, deposited in the church which Harold had founded at Waltham, before he ascended the throne. This event, commonly called the Battle of Hastings, terminated the rule of the Anglo-Saxons in England, and gave the kingdom to the Normans.

STATE OF SOCIETY AMONG THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

54. The great council of the nation, called the Witanagemót (meeting of the witans, or wise men), by whom, as it will have been already observed, the kings were elected, was composed of representatives of the nobles and clergy and the great officers of the kingdom, such as the earls, aldermen, and thanès. The ceorls, churls, or common people, had no voice therein; neither were there deputies from the shires, or counties, or from the cities. Its assent was necessary for all laws, and the clergy took an influential part in its proceedings.

55. Justice was administered principally in the shire-mote, or county court, from which there was the right of appeal to the king. The finding of a verdict was assigned to twelve of the principal thanes (lowest order of nobles), who thus bore some resemblance to a modern jury. The accused cleared himself by his own oath, or those of others, called compurgators, who swore to his innocence. Without these, he was subjected to the ordeal (great judgment); that is, he was compelled to thrust his arm into boiling water, hold a piece of red-hot iron in his hand, or walk over burning ploughshares; and if at the end of three days no signs of injury appeared upon him, his innocence was deemed to be established.

56. The dwellings of the Anglo-Saxons were constructed of wood, having, instead of a chimney, an aperture in the roof. The windows were of lattice-work, but sometimes were covered with a linen blind: in the houses of the rich they were often glazed. The floors were covered with rushes, and the walls sometimes hung with rich tapestry, embroidered with gold or colored thread, the women of this period being skilled in needlework. The furniture was very rude and simple; stools, benches, and settees being used in place of chairs; and these were made of wood, often curiously carved. Many of the vessels employed in eating and drinking were of silver and gold beautifully wrought. Drinking horns supplied the place of glass vessels.

57. The Anglo-Saxons were hospitable, and fond of feasting and merriment; and at their banquets, the harp was passed around, that each, in turn, might contribute by his skill to the entertainment. Their amusements were active and exciting. Among the higher classes, hunting and hawking were favorite sports; while the churl delighted in bear-baiting, the feats of jugglers and tumblers, and the songs of the gleeman, or minstrel. Backgammon,* chess, and dice were also resorted to for more quiet pastime. The ladies were much occupied in spinning; hence the name spinster came to be applied to a young unmarried woman.

58. The foreign commerce of England during this period was considerable, London being the great emporium of the nation. Wool was the chief article of export, and was received back from the continent in fabrics of various kinds. Mints were established in some of the cities and towns, and many of the Anglo-Saxon coins still preserved exhibit remarkable skill.

59. There were no means of diffusing knowledge. The monasteries were almost the only schools; and in these a very few persons received instruction in Greek, Latin, theology, and astronomy; also in some of the fine arts, the monks being often skilled in painting, music, and sculpture. They also spent much of their time in copying and illuminating books on vellum or parchment, which being executed with so much labor, were very costly, a considerable fortune being requisite to obtain a few volumes.

60. Little was done after Alfred's reign to encourage learning and science, the irruptions of the Danes preventing any progressive efforts to cultivate the arts of peace. Almost the only characters conspicuous for their erudition, during the period from Alfred's death to the close of the Anglo-Saxon sway, were Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, and St. Dunstan, his successor; and the learning of these is only remarkable, as a faint glimmering amid the prevailing darkness.

* Backgammon—Little Battle, was a game invented by the Welsh.

SECTION II.

THE NORMAN FAMILY.

Extending from the Accession of William the Conqueror (1066) to the death of Stephen (1154).

1066 1. William I. (surnamed the Conqueror). After to the disastrous battle of Hastings, the English found 1087 they could make no successful opposition to the victor; and therefore as soon as he approached London, all the chief nobility, with Edgar Atheling himself, who on the first intelligence of Harold's death had been proclaimed king, came into his camp and offered him submission. On the Christmas following, he was crowned in Westminster Abbey, in the presence of the English and Norman nobles, both of whom with acclamations accepted him as their sovereign. Indeed, the shouts were so vociferous that the Normans outside, thinking their leader was suffering violence, assaulted the populace and set fire to the city, occasioning a tumult which the newly-crowned king found it difficult to subdue.

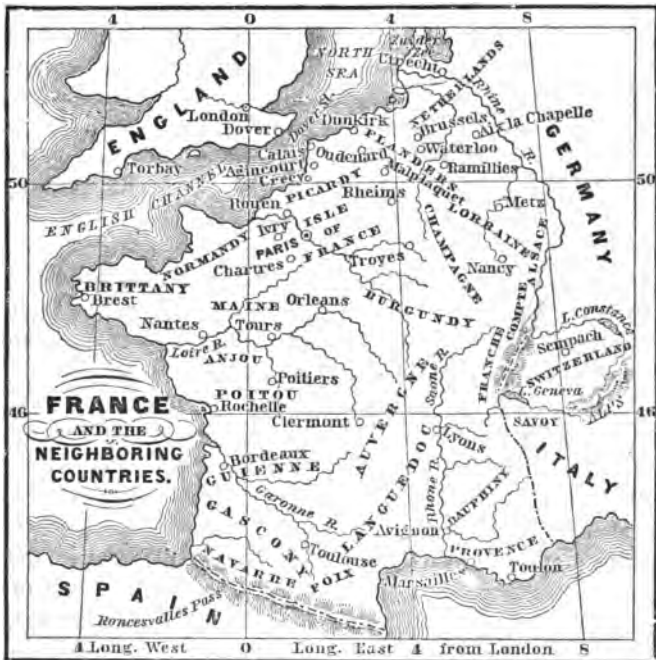

2. Having thus secured the fruits of his great victory, he commenced the government of his new subjects with justice and lenity, treating even Edgar, the heir of the royal Saxon line, with kindness, as being the nephew of his friend and benefactor, Edward the Confessor. He was, however, careful to reward his followers with the confiscated estates of the Saxon nobles, and omitted no precaution necessary to confirm his authority, and protect his government against revolt. He disarmed the city of London and such other places as appeared most formidable, built citadels to overawe the inhabitants, and kept himself constantly in readiness to repel any hostile attack.

3. The people, notwithstanding all this, eagerly watched for a favorable opportunity to recover their lost liberties; and during the absence of William, the year after his coronation, he being in Normandy, secret conspiracies were entered into against his government, and hostilities broke out in many places (1067). Many of those who had been deprived of their lands by the Conqueror banded together, and keeping themselves concealed in woods and marshes, made havoc of all the Normans that came within their reach. The Saxon nobles, including Edgar Atheling and the sons of Harold who had fled to Ireland, with Malcolm, king of Scotland, and Sweyn, king of Denmark, formed a league for the purpose of driving the Normans out of England (1068).

4. With his accustomed vigor and celerity, William, on hearing of these events, hastened from Normandy, and at once took measures to quell this formidable insurrection. The sons of Harold were defeated on their landing upon the western coast; and York, the only fortress in the north, being captured by William, the conspirators fled, and having concluded a peace with Malcolm, the king found his conquest of England more fully confirmed than ever. Similar outbreaks occurring the next year in Northumbria, and being subdued, William ruthlessly ordered the fertile country, extending sixty miles north of the Humber, to be laid waste; and so thoroughly was the mandate obeyed, that at least 100,000 persons perished, and for several years afterward scarcely an inhabitant could be found in that part of the country.

5. The Anglo-Saxons were now excluded from all offices both in the state and in the church; and William surrounded himself with Norman lords, whom he had enriched with the confiscated estates of those implicated in the late insurrections. The Archbishop of Canterbury was degraded from his dignity on frivolous charges, and Lanfranc, a Milanese monk, distinguished for his piety and learning, was promoted to the vacant see (1070). The Norman nobles built castles in every part of the kingdom to protect their newly-acquired estates; and the Saxon people were reduced to the condition of serfs.

6. William was passionately fond of hunting, and passed the severest laws to protect the game, making the punishment for killing a deer or a wild boar greater than for killing a human being. In order to make a new forest near his palace at Winchester, he laid waste a tract of country extending thirty miles, driving out the inhabitants, demolishing houses and even churches, but making no compensation for the injury (1081). He also obliged the people to extinguish their fires and candles at a certain hour, on the ringing of a bell, called the curfew (couvre feu—cover the fire). This requirement was to the English a badge of servitude, although in Normandy, the practice had long been observed as a precaution against fires.

7. The latter part of William's life was made unhappy by domestic troubles. His eldest son Robert made war upon him in Normandy; and on one occasion, the king's face being concealed by his helmet, a combat occurred between Robert and his father, in which the latter was unhorsed, and would have been slain, had not his voice disclosed in time to his rebellious son the dreadful crime which he was about to commit. Struck with horror at the event, Robert immediately submitted; but it was not until some time afterward that the king consented to pardon him.

8. William's death was caused by a severe injury which he received during an invasion of France. Philip, king of that country, had offended him by some insulting words which he had used concerning him, and was suspected also of having instigated an attack which had been made on Normandy by some of the French barons. William in revenge carried fire and sword into the French territories; and having taken the city of Nantes, he laid it in ashes. As he rode through the town, his horse stepping on some burning embers, plunged so violently, that he threw his rider on the pommel of the saddle, and inflicted a mortal hurt. The Conqueror died a few weeks afterward near Rouen, filled with remorse, it is said, for the many wicked and cruel acts which he had committed (1087).

9. William left Normandy and Maine to his eldest son, Robert; directed that his third son, William, should receive the English crown; and bequeathed to his other son, Henry, 5,000 pounds of silver. His second son, Richard, had been killed while hunting in the New Forest. At his death the Norman power had become firmly established in England, the former inhabitants being reduced to a condition of total subjection. In accordance with the Feudal System, most of the lands had been parcelled out among the followers of the Conqueror, they in like manner dividing them among their dependents, on the sole condition of performing the duties of vassalage.* The introduction of this system into England was one of the results of the Norman conquest.

10. The year before William's death, a register was completed of all the estates in the kingdom, showing the extent, nature, and divisions of all the landed property in the several counties, with the products of each, and the woods, mines, &c., contained therein. This important compilation was called "Domesday Book." It is still extant, and in 1783 was printed by the English government. From facts furnished by this record, it is computed that the number of families in England during this reign was about 300,000, and that the population probably amounted to but little over a million.

* Every vassal was bound to do homage to his superior. Unarmed, and with bare head, he knelt before him, and putting his hands in those of his lord, promised to be "his man" thenceforward, and to serve him faithfully for the lands which he held.

1087 11. William II. (surnamed Rufus, the Red, from to the color of his hair). Before the intelligence of the 1100 Conqueror's death had reached England, William arrived, and taking possession of some of the strongest fortresses, and of the royal treasure, was easily enabled to obtain the crown, which, to prevent resistance, the primate Lanfranc and the principal nobility promptly conferred upon him. The Norman barons, however, disliked him, and entered into conspiracy to dethrone him in favor of Robert; but he craftily won over his English subjects by fair promises, and through their aid entirely thwarted the plots of his enemies, who were obliged to flee into Normandy.

12. Indignant at Robert, as the instigator of this rebellion, he in revenge invaded Normandy; but an accommodation was soon entered into between the two brothers, who then united their forces against Prince Henry, and besieged him in a strong fortress which he had seized on the coast of Normandy. The prince was soon obliged to submit, and being deprived of his patrimony, wandered about for some time in great poverty and distress. William, assisted by Robert, then made war upon Malcolm, king of Scotland, and compelled him to accept terms of peace, the Scottish king consenting to do homage to William, and to relinquish Cumberland, which thereafter became an English county (1091).

13. About this time the first crusade was preached, and Robert, wishing to join it, mortgaged to William the duchy of Normandy for five years, receiving therefor a large sum, which the English king obtained by means of forced levies upon his subjects, even compelling the convents to melt their plate in order to furnish their quota. Indeed, William showed, in his desire to obtain money, no religious feeling or respect for the Church. After the death of Lanfranc he neglected to appoint a successor, so that he might keep for his own use the revenues of Canterbury, and failed, in like manner, to fill other vacant bishoprics.

14. At last, falling sick, he, in a fit of remorse, sent to Normandy for Anselm, an abbot much celebrated for learning and piety, and persuaded him to accept the primacy; but when he recovered his health he prosecuted his schemes of rapine with as much violence as before. This brought on a contest between him and Anselm, the latter boldly defending the revenues of the Church against the king's injustice and rapacity. The struggle, however, ended in the retirement of Anselm to Rome, where he was received by the pope with every mark of respect.

15. The taking of Jerusalem by the Crusaders prompted other princes to embark in the enterprise; and William, duke of Guienne (ghe-en') and count of Poitiers (poi-têr'z'), had agreed to mortgage all his dominions to the king of England in order to raise money for the purpose. The latter was about sailing with a fleet and army to pay the money and take possession of these rich provinces, when his reign was suddenly terminated. While hunting in the New Forest, he was shot with an arrow; according to the popular account, accidentally, by his companion Walter Tyrrel;* but, as some suspect, by the unseen hand of an assassin. He was found dead in the forest by a poor charcoal burner, and carried by him to the cathedral at Winchester, where he was buried (1100). At his death he was 42 years of age, and had reigned 13.

16. The character of William Rufus is chiefly remarkable for despotism, rapacity, and debauchery. His temper was extremely violent, and his manners haughty and fierce. He inherited some of the talents of his father, but was more perfidious and cruel. In person he was short and corpulent, with a remarkably florid complexion. He built a new bridge across the Thames at London, surrounded the tower with a wall, and erected Westminster Hall, which still remains a noble specimen of the architecture of the time. William was the third of his race that had perished in the New Forest,—a circumstance regarded by the people as the just vengeance of Heaven for the cruelty of the Conqueror in expelling the inhabitants from their homes in order that he might indulge his passion for hunting.

1100 17. Henry I. (surnamed Beauclerc (bo-clerk)—the to Scholar). Henry was in the forest, engaged in hunt-1135 ing, when he heard of his brother's death; and hastening to Winchester, he obtained possession of the royal treasures, and thus secured his succession to the throne, notwithstanding the just claims of his elder brother Robert, then on his return from the Holy Land. He was crowned at Westminster the third day after William's death. One of his first acts was the publication of a charter of liberties, in which he granted to the Church and the barons certain privileges, and promised to the people to restore the laws of Edward the Confessor, conferring at the same time special immunities on the citizens of London. The forest laws were, however, retained in all their severity.

18. Still further to gain the respect and good-will of the nation, he recalled Archbishop Anselm, and married Matilda, daughter of the king of Scotland, and niece of Edgar Atheling. This Saxon princess was particularly dear to the English, and her marriage with the king was the cause of great rejoicing to them. She was beautiful and amiable, winning from the Saxon chroniclers the appellation of Maud the Good. Meanwhile, Robert had returned to Normandy, and having laid claim to the English throne, determined to make it good by force of arms, being encouraged in the enterprise by many of the Norman barons. He landed in England with his forces, and Henry advanced with an army to meet him; but, through the influence of Anselm, peace was made between the brothers, Robert, who was easy and good-natured, giving up all claim to England for a pension of 3000 marks (1101).

19. Robert's dissoluteness, indiscretion, and neglect soon afforded a pretext to Henry to invade Normandy, which, under the misrule of Robert, had become a scene of violence and anarchy. He gained a great victory over Robert, made a complete conquest of the duchy, and carried his unfortunate brother a prisoner to England (1106). Robert remained a captive at Cardiff, in Wales, until his death, twenty-eight years afterward; having, it is said, in the early part of his confinement, been deprived of sight by his cruel brother, for an attempt to escape. Edgar Atheling, who had fought with Robert, was also made a prisoner; but Henry soon restored him to liberty, and settled a pension on him. He lived to a good old age in England, totally neglected and forgotten.

20. Robert's son William (called Fitz-Robert) was also spared, and afterward gave the king considerable trouble; for the king of France, uniting with the counts of Anjou and Flanders in support of his cause, invaded Normandy, and took many towns and castles. In the wars which ensued, Henry was generally successful; but it was not until William Fitz-Robert's death (1128) that he was released from anxiety on his account. Previous to this he suffered a terrible blow in the loss of his only son, William, who perished by shipwreck on his return from Normandy (1120). Henry fainted away when he received the sad news; and from that moment, it is said, he lost all cheerfulness, and was never seen to smile. The loss of Prince William was a source of joy to the English; for he was a cruel and dissolute young man, and had boasted that when he came to the throne he would yoke his English subjects to the plough like oxen.

21. The king being without male heirs, made the barons take an oath of fealty to his daughter Matilda, who had been married first to Henry V., emperor of Germany, but was now the wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet,* son of the earl of Anjou. Henry's death occurred, a few years after, in Normandy, in the sixty-seventh year of his age and the thirty-fifth of his reign (1135). His character resembled that of his father, in the great qualities of body and mind which enabled him to acquire the throne, and to administer the government with vigor and address. His person was manly, his countenance engaging, his eyes clear and penetrating. His unusual progress in literature had obtained for him the surname of Beauclerc, the Scholar. He was afterward styled the "Lion of Justice," from the severity with which he punished offenders against the laws. His private life was, however, very immoral; and he was so deceitful and treacherous, that even his favorites mistrusted him.

1135 22. Stephen. Notwithstanding the oath which 1154 to the barons had taken in favor of Matilda, Stephen, a grandson of William the Conqueror, and son of the count of Blois (blwah), found little difficulty in obtaining the throne. With the royal treasures he hired great numbers of foreign soldiers, in order to secure himself in possession of the kingdom; and to satisfy the people, issued a liberal charter of privileges. To induce the nobles to submit to his usurped authority, he granted them permission to fortify their castles; and all England was, accordingly, filled with these fortresses, garrisoned by the vassals of their proprietors, or by licentious soldiers gathered from all parts of Europe, who made the country a scene of rapine and desolation.

* Plantagenet means, in French, broom-plant; and was given as a surname to this family, it is said, because one of their ancestors had done penance by scourging himself with twigs of that plant. Pronounced Plan-tij'-e-net.

23. The king of Scotland, in defence of his niece's title, invaded the northern counties, and committed the most barbarous devastations. He was, however, defeated in the great battle of the Standard, so called from a high crucifix carried by the English as a military ensign (1138). The next year, Matilda, encouraged by some of the English prelates, with whom Stephen had quarrelled, landed in England with a small retinue, and was soon joined by many of the barons. Civil war ensued, occasioning the most dreadful anarchy and disorder. Licensed robbers sallied forth day and night from the castles of the nobles, and committed every species of lawless violence upon the defenceless people. Villages and cities were burned, the lands remained untilled, and famine and pestilence swept away both the spoilers and their victims.

24. At length, after several conflicts, Stephen was defeated near Lincoln, and made prisoner (1141). The claims of Matilda were solemnly recognized by the clergy; but her imperious behavior soon disgusted all parties, and she was finally compelled to flee into Normandy, after several years of war (1146). The king, who had previously been released, was now restored. A few years afterward his right was again assailed by Henry, son of Matilda, who had acquired Normandy and Maine from his mother; from his father by inheritance, Anjou (ahn'joo) and Tou-raine'; and by his marriage with Eleanor, the divorced queen of France, Guienne, Poitou (pwah-too'), and several other provinces. Encouraged by these great possessions, he invaded England, but after gaining some advantages over Stephen, he was induced to make a treaty, by which, upon the death of the king, he was to succeed to the throne (1153). This event occurred the following year.

STATE OF SOCIETY UNDER THE NORMAN KINGS.

25. The Norman Conquest wrought many great changes in the social as well as political condition of the people. Among these, the establishment of the Feudal System was the most considerable; which system continued to exist in England during about four centuries. Something like feudal tenures had existed among the Saxons; but they were only of a special or exceptional character. William made them universal, and based upon them the whole framework of his political system. In accordance with this system, the title of all the land was possessed by the king, who assigned certain portions to the nobles or barons, by whom these were subdivided among the next lower class, partly consisting of the Saxon thanes, or franklins, as they were called by the Normans; and these again distributed them among their dependents. Thus, in each case, the title was made to depend upon the relation of the vassal to his superior.

26. This peculiar relation was established for the purpose of obtaining and preserving military strength; and was admirably adapted to this end. Thus, when the king needed an army he summoned his barons, who in like manner called upon their vassals, and they at once made a similar demand upon their dependents; so that, with wonderful promptitude, the whole force of the nation was brought into the field. The barons lived on their estates almost with the power of sovereign princes, each having his court and train of dependents, and protected by his strong castle against all attacks.

27. These feudal castles soon became a striking feature of the Norman period, their whole appearance indicating that the only objects of their construction were strength and security. They were surrounded by walls often more than twelve feet high, within which was a lofty tower called the Keep, whose massive walls, pierced with small windows or loop-holes, defied the fiercest assault. Here the baron lived, and here was stored the property of the castle. Under it, was a gloomy dungeon in which those who had offended its haughty master were thrust, and often left to die of famine. The ruins of some of these castles still exist.

28. The most numerous class in England were the Saxon churls, or, as called by the Normans, villains. These were farmers, and were obliged to place themselves under the protection of some noble, as otherwise they might be seized as robbers. They were bound to reside on the lands which they held from their lords, unless permitted to leave them. Next below these, were the serfs, who were in all respects bondmen, being attached to the soil, and subject to the will of their masters. The number of these registered in Domesday Book amounts to 25,000.

29. Closely connected with feudalism, was the peculiar institution entitled Chivalry, or Knighthood. The former constituted the basis of the political system, the latter was of a moral and social character. It was a singular combination of religion, military valor, and gallantry; and for several centuries exercised a prevailing influence upon the manners, customs, and opinions of all classes of the people. Although its origin can be faintly discerned in the institutions and practices of the German and Gothic nations, its full development was not reached till the eleventh or twelfth century, being rapidly matured by the Crusades, from which it received a strong religious character.

30. Those destined for knighthood received, from their earliest years, a peculiar training. The first degree was that of page (called sometimes child or varlet): after the age of fourteen, the page might be made an esquire, and was allowed to bear arms. He was then kept in constant service, waiting upon the master and mistress of the castle, and acquiring habits of perfect obedience and courtesy. Every care was taken to impress indelibly upon his mind a love of chivalry,—that is, a devotion to feats of arms in behalf of the weak and oppressed, or in vindication of religion, and the honor and virtue of the female sex.

31. By means of this training, he was prepared to receive his golden spurs, and to take the vows of a knight. The candidate for this honor was obliged, the night before receiving it, to hold his vigil; that is, he kept silent watch within some gloomy chapel over the arms which he was about to assume. The chief of these was the lance, besides which he had a two-handed sword, the “dagger of mercy,” and sometimes a battle-axe or mace. He was clad from head to foot in armor, consisting of plates of metal riveted together, and worn over a dress of soft leather. His helmet bore a crest, ornamented by favors bestowed by the lady of his knightly devotion, and on his triangular shield was a coat of arms.

32. The display of chivalry was not confined to the battle-field, but found a frequent occasion in the tournament or joust—the highest species of amusement of this period.

30. Training of those designed for knighthood? The page? The esquire? What sentiments were imparted?

31. How was knighthood assumed? The knight's equipment?

32. The tournament? Mode of combat? Its usual result?

It consisted of fierce personal contests, held in an enclosed space called the lists, around which, in galleries, sat the nobles and ladies to witness the sport, the outside being thronged with eager spectators from the lower orders. At the sound of the trumpet, the combatants, covered with steel and known only by their emblazoned shields, dashed at full gallop from the opposite ends of the lists; and meeting in the centre with a terrific shock, one or the other was generally unhorsed, their lances often being shivered to pieces. The vanquished was thrown bruised and bleeding to the ground; and the victor was rewarded by receiving his horse and armor, and sometimes by the privilege of naming some lady, who, with the title of Queen of Love, presided over the remainder of the tournament. In other cases, he received a scarf, ribbon, or other favor from the lady in whose honor the tournament was held.

33. These combats were not only used for sport, but were resorted to in order to discover the guilty; it being the prevailing belief that Providence would interpose, in all such cases, for the protection of the innocent. In this conviction, those who were charged with crime were challenged by their accusers, and were compelled to abide the issue of a personal combat in the lists. This appeal of the Normans to the justice of Heaven closely resembled the ordeal of the Saxons; and upon it was based the practice of the duel in more modern times.

34. The dress of the Normans was, in many respects, peculiar. A short cloak, often richly furred and ornamented with gold lace, worn over a loose doublet reaching half way down the leg, formed the most conspicuous portion of the gentleman's costume. The shoes had very long pointed toes, sometimes twisted in a very curious manner, and occasionally fastened by gold or silver chains to the knees.

33. For what were these combats sometimes used? Why? What does this custom resemble?

34. Dress of the Normans? Of the Norman ladies?

Long hose, fastened to the doublet by strings, called points, and a velvet bonnet, completed the costume. The Norman ladies wore a loose wide-sleeved robe reaching to the ground, and covering a kirtle or under-gown of silk.

35. Other modes of costume were peculiar to various characters. Thus the minstrel was distinguished by his harp strung on his shoulder, a plate of silver on his arm, and a chain around his neck bearing the tuning-key; the fool, or jester, by his cap and bells, and his party-colored dress; the palmer, or pilgrim, by his sandals, the scallop-shells bordering his hat, and his iron-shod staff. The Saxon serf was clothed in untanned hide, sandals of hog-skin, and leathern hose, and wore a collar of brass engraved with his master's name.

36. The Normans had two regular meals—dinner and supper; and at these, flesh meats constituted a much more prominent article of food than with the Saxons. Thus, the names of these meats, as veal, pork, mutton, beef, etc., are of Norman or French origin; while the names of the animals themselves,—calf, pig, sheep, ox, etc., which were tended by the Saxon farmers or serfs, are of Saxon origin. Wine was the favorite beverage of the higher classes, while the lower orders regaled themselves with ale.

37. Learning at this period was almost exclusively confined to the cloister, the monks and priests being the only scholars. Every monastery had its writing-room, where the copying of books was constantly carried on. The most noted among the writers of this time were William of Malmsbury, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Henry of Huntingdon. These were the authors of several interesting chronicles, to some of which allusion has already been made.

SECTION IV.

THE PLANTAGENETS.

Extending from the Accession of Henry II. (1154), to that of Henry IV. of Lancaster (1399).

1154 1. Henry II. (Plantagenet). Adding his extensive possessions in France to the English dominions, 1189 Henry became, on the death of Stephen, one of the richest and most powerful monarchs in Europe. He commenced his reign with vigor and resolution; and the foreign mercenaries who had so long infested the country were ordered to leave it, under the penalty of death. He revoked the grants of land which had been unjustly made during the previous reign, reclaimed the castles belonging to the crown, and compelled the disorderly nobles to dismantle their fortresses, by which they had been enabled to inflict so many cruelties upon the people.

2. Having thus restored order to the kingdom by reducing the inordinate power of the barons, he next determined to bring the ecclesiastical power into subjection to that of the crown. As a fit instrument for carrying this into effect he chose Thomas à Becket, whom, on his accession, he had appointed chancellor, and subsequently had treated with the highest regard and honor, intrusting to him the education of his eldest son. Becket was of English descent, and had risen to eminence through his own talents and industry. The pomp of his retinue, the sumptuousness of his furniture and apparel, and the luxury of his table, are said to have been scarcely surpassed by those of the king, who himself frequently condescended to partake of the entertainments of his proud minister.

3. On the death of the archbishop of Canterbury, Henry naturally supposed that he should greatly facilitate his design with respect to the Church by conferring the primacy upon a man so wedded to his interests as Becket. He accordingly issued orders to this effect, and the chancellor was duly installed in that high dignity. The king, however, soon found that he had been mistaken in his estimate of Becket's character; for the latter at once resigned the office of chancellor, abandoned all secular affairs, and devoting himself exclusively to his sacred duties, in a short time became as famous for his austerity and piety, as he had previously been for gayety, luxury, and splendor. He wore sackcloth next his skin, partook only of bread and water; frequently scourged himself in the severest manner; and it is said, daily on his knees washed the feet of thirteen beggars, to evince his humility, and show penitence for his former pride and arrogance.

4. Determined to defend the privileges of his order, he was soon brought into a conflict with the king; the latter insisting that clergymen charged with the commission of crimes should be tried in the civil courts, while the archbishop asserted that they were amenable only to the ecclesiastical authority. The king therefore summoned an assembly of the prelates, and submitted to them the question in dispute; but receiving only an evasive answer, he called a general council of the nobility and prelates at Clarendon, at which were proposed and adopted sixteen articles, called the "Constitutions of Clarendon," by which the clergy were made subservient to the royal authority (1164).

3. Why was Becket made chancellor? What course did he pursue?

4. What conflict ensued? What was done by the king? What were the Constitutions of Clarendon?

5. Becket for a time withheld his assent to these propositions; but finding himself deserted by the other bishops, he at last solemnly promised to observe them. The Roman pontiff, however, annulled them; and Becket repented of his compliance, and renewed his opposition to the king. Henry, highly exasperated, caused the inflexible prelate to be prosecuted and condemned for contempt of the royal authority; and also demanded of him restitution of several large sums of money. Becket, finding resistance useless, secretly departed from England, and took refuge with the king of France, by whom, as well as by the Pope, he was encouraged and sustained, the latter threatening Henry with excommunication.

6. A settlement was, however, effected; and the king consented to the return of Becket, after six years of banishment, on terms quite favorable to the archbishop. The people and clergy received him with joyful acclamations, and the king hoped that all cause of trouble was at an end; but the archbishop had brought letters of suspension and excommunication against three prelates for being concerned with the king in illegal acts during his absence, and proceeded violently to enforce them. When the intelligence of this was brought to Henry, he burst into a paroxysm of rage, and exclaimed, "Is there no one of my subjects who will rid me of this insolent priest?" Four knights, construing this as a command, immediately proceeded to the residence of the prelate, and, pursuing him into the cathedral, barbarously slew him before the altar (1170).

7. Henry was in Normandy when this occurred, and when he heard of it, was thrown into the greatest consternation. He expressed the deepest sorrow for the words he had hastily uttered, and evinced the sincerity of his repentance by acts of the severest penance. Four years later he resolved to go as a pilgrim to the tomb of the murdered prelate, already canonized as a saint and martyr; and for miles of the way walked barefoot over the flinty road, marking his steps with blood. Independently of its atrocity, nothing could have been more disastrous to the king's cause than the murder of Becket; for the Church party gained more by the death of their champion than all his best efforts could have won for them if he had lived, talented and determined as he was. Henry could obtain absolution from the Pope only by taking a solemn oath of innocence, and by promising to abolish all customs hostile to the liberties of the clergy, which had been introduced since his accession.

8. One of the most important events of this reign was the conquest of Ireland, which Henry partly effected in 1172. Ireland, anciently called Hibernia, was peopled by a race similar to the Britons; but little is known of its history before the fourth century. Each province had its separate king, but was dependent upon the monarch who held his court at Tara. In the fifth century the people were converted to Christianity, chiefly through the efforts of the renowned St. Patrick.* From the sixth to the twelfth century, Ireland became famous for its progress in literature and art, and sent forth many learned men and missionaries from the monasteries which had been established. For three centuries it was much harassed by the Northmen or Danes; but in 1014, the latter were utterly defeated in a great battle fought at Clon'tarf, near Dublin.

9. Some years before the death of Becket, Henry obtained permission from the Pope to subdue the island; but it was not until 1172 that an opportunity offered for effecting this object. One of the five subordinate kings having been expelled from his province, and having taken refuge in England, succeeded in enlisting a force from the Anglo-Norman nobles and adventurers commanded by Richard de Clare, surnamed Strongbow, with which he regained his kingdom. The English under Strongbow then so rapidly prosecuted the conquest of the country, that the next year Henry went there, and having received the submission of most of the native chiefs, committed the government of the conquered territory to a viceroy whom he appointed (1172).

10. This successful undertaking of Henry was followed by great troubles, occasioned by family dissensions. Three of his five sons, Henry, Richard, and Geoffrey, demanded a share of his dominions, and being refused, went to France, and entered into an alliance with Louis, king of that country, against their father. In this rebellion they were encouraged by their mother, Eleanor, who had become incensed against the king for his licentiousness, and particularly on account of his attachment to Rosamond Clifford, styled, in the ballads of the time, the "Fair Rosamond." William, king of Scotland, also entered into the league against Henry, and invaded the northern counties. It was in these distressful circumstances that the pilgrimage to Canterbury was made, when he received absolution from all connection with the murder of Becket.

11. So immediate seemed the answer to Henry's prayers and repentance, that the next day he received intelligence that the Scottish king had been defeated in a great battle, and taken prisoner (1174). This event destroyed the confederacy, and compelled its members to make submission to the English monarch. Peace was made with Louis, the rebellious princes returned to their obedience, and the king of Scotland was released on condition that he would thereafter hold his throne as a vassal to the king of England; and, to enforce this, the cities of Berwick and Roxburgh, together with the castle of Edinburgh, were placed in the possession of the English (1175).

12. The latter part of Henry's reign was embittered by the renewed rebellion of his sons; but, in the midst of it, Henry, the eldest, was seized with a fatal illness, and died, feeling the deepest remorse for his unnatural conduct (1183). Geoffrey was killed in a tournament (1186); but Richard continued in his disobedience, and, encouraged by Philip of France, again took up arms against his father. Disheartened by these renewed misfortunes, Henry submitted to a very humiliating treaty of peace with the French king (1189); and when in the list of those who had been connected with Richard, and whom he had consented to pardon, he found the name of his youngest son, John—his especial favorite—the unhappy father yielded to despair, and heart-broken, sank a few days afterward into the grave (1189).

13. He was undoubtedly a great monarch, distinguished for wisdom and ability. He was averse to war; but when it was unavoidable, he entered into it with spirit and energy, and conducted it with talent and success. His administration of the government was characterized both by vigor and justice; and he did much to establish the royal authority in opposition to the violence of the feudal barons, and to the exorbitant claims and pretensions of the clergy. He was a patron of learning and art; and many Gothic edifices of great splendor were erected during his reign. The arts of civilized life also made considerable progress during the same period.

1189 14. Richard I. Cœur de Lion [kyur duh le-ong] to —the Lion-hearted).—Henry's two elder sons having 1190 died, he was succeeded by his third son, Richard. Before the death of his father, Richard had engaged with Philip of France to enter upon a crusade against the infidels in Palestine; and accordingly the year after his accession, leaving his kingdom to be administered by two bishops, whom he appointed its guardians, he set out. Previous to his departure some of the Jews, having brought him presents on the day of his coronation, were insulted by the populace; and a rumor spreading that the king had commanded a massacre of these people, the populace, not only in London, but in York, and other cities, rose up against them, and many were put to death with barbarous cruelty.

15. After many delays, Richard and Philip arrived at their place of destination, and joined their forces to the other Christians, who, for two years, had besieged Acre (a'ker)*. In a short time the city surrendered; but Philip, jealous of the superior abilities of Richard, and offended at his arrogance, determined to return home. Richard then marched his army to Ascalon,† which, after many battles with the renowned Saladin, he succeeded in taking. He could, however, only obtain a sight of Jerusalem; for when he came near that city he found his forces so reduced in numbers, and so enfeebled by famine and hardship, that he was obliged to return (1192).

16. He therefore concluded a truce with Saladin, who agreed that Acre and other seaport towns in Palestine should remain in the hands of the Christians, and that the pilgrims should be permitted to visit the Holy City without molestation (1192). Richard had performed prodigies of valor in his numerous battles with the Saracens, and had exhibited the highest characteristics of an able and daring leader. So well known were his strength and courage, that, it is said, the Saracens would often say to their horses when restive, "What! do you think you see King Richard?" When it was necessary to repair the ruined walls of Ascalon, Richard, to encourage the soldiers, labored in person; and so great was the admiration in which he was held by Saladin, that, when he was dangerously sick with a fever, the generous sultan sent him fruits, ice to cool them, and other things necessary to aid in his recovery.

17. On his voyage homeward, Richard was shipwrecked on the coast of Istria. As he had given great offence to the duke of Austria in Palestine, he undertook to travel through Germany in the disguise of a pilgrim to prevent discovery and arrest. He was, however, discovered, made a captive by the duke, and delivered to the emperor, by whom he was kept in confinement until his subjects consented to pay a large ransom for his liberation. This unjust treatment of so valiant a champion of the cross excited great indignation, not only in England, but in other countries of Europe; but Philip, although he had promised not to invade the dominions of his colleague, with the grossest treachery and falsehood plotted with John to seize upon the dominions of the English monarch, and divide them between themselves.

18. This scheme was disconcerted by the return of the lawful sovereign, on whose appearance the joy of the English was beyond bounds; and John was obliged to ask pardon of his much-injured brother (1194). It was generously granted, at Queen Eleanor's intercession, with the exclamation: "O, that I could forget his injuries as soon as he will my forgiveness!" After settling the affairs of England, Richard made war upon Philip in revenge for his treachery, and transported an army into Normandy for the purpose. Hostilities continued, with occasional interruptions, until Richard's death, which was caused by a wound received while besieging the castle of a rebellious vassal in France (1199). He died in the tenth year of his reign, and the forty-second of his age.

19. The character of this monarch is one of the most romantic to be found in history, and displayed a love of adventure, a military daring, and a strength and skill in feats of arms, unsurpassed in ancient or modern times. His people, oppressed by the taxes which were ruthlessly levied to carry out his useless projects, were yet proud of his fame, though he accomplished nothing for their benefit, nor advanced in any respect, the prosperity of the country. The best traits of his character were his fearlessness, generosity, and candor; but these were counterbalanced by his haughtiness, cruelty, and disregard for the good of others. He was passionately fond of music and poetry, being himself the author of several songs, which have given him a reputation among the troubadours, or poets of the time. Blondel, one of these minstrels, was his especial favorite.*

to children, was succeeded by his brother John; 1216 although Arthur, Geoffrey's son, a youth of twelve years, was the rightful heir to the throne. Indeed, the barons in the French provinces declared in his favor; and Philip also embraced Arthur's cause. John, having been crowned, immediately took active measures to defend his authority; and the French king, always actuated by selfish motives, entered into a treaty with him, and deserted the young prince (1200). Two years afterward the war was renewed, and Philip again brought Prince Arthur forward as a claimant to the throne against John; but the latter succeeded, in the course of the war, in taking his nephew prisoner, and caused him to be cruelly murdered (1203).

* According to tradition, it was Blondel who discovered, after many wanderings, the place of his captivity in Germany, by singing under the walls of his prison his favorite song, to which Richard at once responded.

21. Philip, at the instigation of the nobles of Brittany, then summoned John, as duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, to answer for this offence before a court of peers; but he refused to obey the summons, and was accordingly adjudged to lose all his French territories, which Philip, in a few years, succeeded in conquering and annexing to his own dominions. Thus, of all the French provinces which Henry Plantagenet had acquired, scarcely a single castle was left to acknowledge the sovereignty of his wicked and imbecile son.

22. John was next involved in a quarrel with the Roman pontiff (Innocent III.), who, on the death of the archbishop of Canterbury (1205), had, without regard to the king's authority, caused Stephen Langton to be elected to the vacancy. John refusing to give his sanction to the appointment, Innocent placed the kingdom under an interdict, the effect of which was, that the churches were closed, the dead were refused Christian burial, and all other religious offices ceased (1208). The king still resisting, was formally excommunicated by the pope (1209); his people were then absolved from their allegiance to him, and a solemn injunction was laid upon Philip to execute the sentence and take possession of the kingdom (1212).

23. John, finding that he could not rely upon his subjects to make opposition to the French monarch, at last submitted, acknowledged Langton as primate, and solemnly surrendered his dominions to the pope, promising to hold them as his obedient vassal, and to pay him an annual tribute (1213). Philip, persisting in his design to conquer England, sustained a great disaster in the loss of his fleet, which was attacked by the English and destroyed (in the harbor of Damme (dam), in Flanders). This was the first naval action of importance between the French and English.

24. John's next contest was with his own subjects, whom he had inspired with universal discontent and hatred by his insolence, tyranny, and arbitrary exactions; and to these was now added the disgrace which they felt he had brought upon the nation by abandoning its independence, and surrendering it to a foreign power. The barons, therefore, under the leadership of Langton, determined to wrest from the king a charter of privileges, by which the royal authority should be restrained, and the liberties of the people more securely established.

25. This, John steadily refused until a large army had been raised by the barons, and the city of London taken, when he finally submitted, and signed the famous Magna Charta (the Great Charter) at Runnymede (June 15, 1215). One of the most important articles of this instrument was, that "no delay should take place in doing justice to every one; and no freeman should be taken or imprisoned, dispossessed of his free tenement, outlawed, or banished, unless by the legal judgment of his peers." This celebrated charter, therefore, although granted to the nobles, protected the rights of all, and is justly regarded as the palladium of English liberty.

26. Although he had signed this instrument, and solemnly pledged his word to observe its provisions, John, with his accustomed faithlessness and treachery, determined if possible to disregard it and to punish its authors. For this purpose he raised an army of foreign soldiers, and, under the sanction of a decree of the pope, revoked his assent to the charter. The barons were taken by surprise; and John, with his barbarous mercenaries, marched through the kingdom, perpetrating every species of cruelty, and laying waste county after county with fire and sword.

27. The barons, seeing no other means of redress, then had recourse to Philip of France, and offered to acknowledge his son Louis king of England on condition of receiving aid against their tyrannical sovereign. An army was accordingly sent over with Louis at its head; and John took measures to assemble all his forces to oppose it; but, passing from Lynn to Lincoln, his road lay along the sea-shore, and being overtaken by the tide, he lost all his carriages, treasures, and baggage. This disaster, coupled with the distracted condition of his affairs, threw him into a fever, of which he in a few days expired, in the eighteenth year of his detestable reign (1216).

28. Few characters in history deserve so thoroughly the execration and contempt of mankind as this wicked king. Falsehood, cowardice, tyranny, and licentiousness marked his whole conduct; and not a redeeming trait seems to have existed to save him from utter reprobation. His ingratitude to his kind father, his treachery to his generous brother, and his cruelty toward his innocent nephew, were only equalled in baseness by the cowardice with which he surrendered the rights of his subjects when it seemed necessary to serve his own interests. Yet, bad as he was, he proved an instrument for good in the hands of a beneficent Providence; since his intolerable oppression drove the barons into rebellion, and was thus the means of securing the freedom of the people.

1216 29. Henry III.—At the time of John's death, the to earl of Pembroke was marshal of England, and he, 1272 without delay, caused Henry, the son of the late king, a youth nine years of age, to be crowned. Pembroke, who was an able and virtuous nobleman, was, at a general council of the barons, chosen protector of the realm. One of his first acts was to cause the Great Charter to be renewed and confirmed; and consequently most of the rebellious nobles soon made their submission to his government. The French army being defeated at Lincoln, and a fleet bringing him succor being destroyed, he was obliged to leave the kingdom. This ended the civil war which the oppression of King John had excited.
Pembroke soon after died (1219); and the government was subsequently administered for nearly ten years by Hubert de Burgh, a nobleman who had acquired great renown in the recent naval action with the French.

30. As the young king advanced in age, he was found to resemble his father in the weakness of his character, but was gentle, merciful, and humane. For years he showered favors upon his minister Hubert de Burgh, and implicitly followed his counsels; but, at length, in a fit of caprice, not only dismissed him, but subjected him to a series of the most merciless persecutions (1231). Peter, bishop of Winchester, a native of Poitou (pwah-too'),* then became his chief counsellor; and, acting on his advice, he invited over a great number of foreigners, on whom he conferred the most important offices and dignities, in order that through them he might counterbalance the power of the English nobles. Having married Eleanor, daughter of the count of Provence (pro-vonse')* (1236), he also brought over a number of strangers from that country, whom he enriched at the expense of his own subjects.

31. To these grievances were also added the exactions of the court of Rome, to which Henry had, on his accession, renewed the oath of allegiance taken by his father. All the chief offices in the Church were bestowed on Italians, and a large part of the ecclesiastical revenues were claimed by the Roman pontiff. Moreover, the latter having decreed the forfeiture of the crown of Sicily, offered it to Henry, who, accepting the proposal, spent vast sums of money in attempting to complete its conquest; and, in order to pay the debt thus incurred, applied to the Parliament for supplies. This, with other unwise and arbitrary acts, involved him in a difficulty with the barons, who compelled him in the most solemn manner to promise compliance with the provisions of Magna Charta; but, under the influence of his unworthy favorites, he broke all his engagements.

32. The barons, therefore, under the leadership of Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester (les'ter), being resolved to take the government into their own hands, appointed a council of state from their own number to redress the grievances under which they suffered; and Henry was compelled to acquiesce in their authority (1258). This proceeding was at first popular; but the council becoming exorbitant in their demands, the favor of the people inclined toward the king; and the influence of the barons became still farther impaired by the dissensions between the chief leaders, the earls of Leicester and Gloucester (glos'ter). Louis IX. also sustained the cause of the king against the rebellious barons, and exerted himself to pacify the contending parties.

33. Civil war soon broke out, and Leicester, summoning his partisans from all quarters, gained a decisive victory over the royal forces at Lewes (1264), taking Henry and his son Edward prisoners. The whole power of the kingdom was thus thrown into the hands of Leicester, who, in order to strengthen his influence, summoned a parliament, giving seats in it, not only to the barons and knights, but to the representatives of the boroughs, or towns (1265). This is considered the first institution of the House of Commons, which, representing the will of the great body of the people, has ever proved the chief bulwark of the political and civil liberty of the country.

34. Prince Edward having escaped from the confinement in which he had been kept by Leicester, raised an army; and in the battle of Evesham, entirely defeated the forces of Leicester, who, with his eldest son, was among the slain (1265). The victors, with savage ferocity, wreaked their vengeance upon his lifeless body; but the people long regarded him as a martyr to their cause and the champion of their liberties. By this victory Henry's authority was re-established in all parts of the kingdom; and Prince Edward having by prudent measures restored general tranquillity, and infused a wiser and more popular spirit in the government, went on a crusade to the Holy Land, in connection with King Louis of France (1270). Before his return his father died, after the exceedingly long reign of fifty-six years (1272).

35. Henry was mild and pacific in his disposition, but possessed neither the talents nor force of character required to cope successfully with the difficulties of so disturbed a period. Like all weak sovereigns, he was inconsistent and vacillating in his measures, and thus acquired the reproach of great insincerity. England, during his reign, increased in wealth and influence, and widely extended her commercial relations with other countries. This period also appears to mark the thorough intermingling of the Saxon and Norman races. The English language began to assume its present form; and the difference in dress, so long a mark of distinction between the conquering and the conquered people, had nearly passed away before the end of Henry's reign.

1272 36. Edward I.—The son of the late king, who to had already acquired among the English a high 1307 reputation for talent and address, was at once acknowledged sovereign by the barons, although absent, not having returned from his expedition to Palestine. After many glorious achievements in that country, he had hastened his departure, having heard of his father's illness; and had reached Sicily, when he received tidings of the king's death, and of the peaceful settlement of the crown upon himself. He, accordingly, made no haste to occupy the throne, but spent more than a year in Italy and France before he arrived in England. After his coronation (1274), he made provision for the proper administration of justice and for a strict execution of the laws.

37. The first event of importance during this reign, was the conquest of Wales. Llew-el'lyn, prince of that country, had been concerned in the rebellion of Simon de Montfort, but after his death had been pardoned. Edward, on his accession, repeatedly sent him a summons to perform the duty of a vassal; and on his refusal invaded the country with an army, and compelled him to yield obedience (1277). Five years afterward the Welsh prince, with the aid of his brother David, again asserted his independence; but in an action with the English, under Edward, was defeated and slain (1282). David was a short time afterward taken prisoner, sent in chains to Shrewsbury, and there executed as a traitor (1283). The principality was then annexed to the crown, and vested in the king's son, Edward, who was born at Caernarvon (ker-nar'von), and by the death of his elder brother became heir to the English throne. Ever since that event the heir-apparent has been styled the "Prince of Wales."

38. The persecutions to which the Jews were exposed illustrate the bigotry as well as barbarity of these times. Clipping the coin was made a capital offence; and in the first part of this reign, 280 Jews were hanged, the sole evidence of their guilt being the possession of some of this coin (1278). A few years afterward, all the Jews in England were imprisoned, and were only released on their paying to the king £12,000; and finally the whole race, to the number of over 16,000, were banished the kingdom (1290). It was nearly four centuries before any of that proscribed race were allowed again to come into England.

39. The wars with Scotland occupy nearly all the rest of this reign. Alexander III., king of that country, having died without heirs, numerous competitors arose for the throne, the most prominent of whom were John Ba'liol and Robert Bruce, the former being the grandson of a second daughter, and the latter a son of a third daughter, of David, the brother of William II., the king whom Henry II. had defeated and taken prisoner. The parliament of Scotland, wishing to avoid a civil war, referred the matter to the arbitration of Edward, who took advantage of the circumstances to claim his right, as lord paramount, to the Scottish throne; and to this the Scots, though with great indignation, were compelled to submit (1291).

38. What is said of the persecutions of the Jews? Their banishment?

39. What wars occupy much of this reign? What question arose as to the succession in Scotland? What course did Edward pursue?

40. The question between Baliol and Bruce having been decided by the most celebrated lawyers of Europe in favor of the former, as being the most direct heir, he was accordingly placed upon the throne, after having taken the oath of fealty to the English monarch (1292). Not satisfied with this, Edward so harassed Baliol with frequent and degrading commands, that the latter determined at all hazards to make a stand for his own and his country's liberty, especially as at that time a war had broken out between England and France. This war had its origin in a quarrel between the crews of an English and a Norman vessel, who happening to go to the same place to fill their water-casks, fell into a dispute, in the course of which one of the Normans was slain. This bred dissensions between the sailors of both countries, and the sea soon became a scene of constant combat and piracies between them. At length a fleet of English ships encountered one of Norman vessels, and after a fierce battle, destroyed or captured nearly the whole (1293).

41. Philip, king of France, being then appealed to, summoned Edward, as duke of Guienne (ghe-en'), to appear and answer for these offences committed by his subjects; and afterward artfully persuaded him temporarily to relinquish possession of the duchy, as a satisfaction for all injuries. The French king thus obtaining control of Guienne, again cited Edward, and on his refusal to appear, declared the duchy forfeited, and annexed it to his own dominions (1294). In order still farther to embarrass Edward, he entered into a secret alliance with Baliol, thus commencing that union between the Scottish and French nations which for centuries was maintained by their common hostility to the English. In order to obtain the supplies needed to carry on this double war, Edward called a parliament, to which he directed that the representatives of the boroughs should be summoned, stating that "what concerns all should be approved by all,"—a principle that lies at the foundation of all civil and political freedom (1295).

42. Edward, with characteristic energy, marched into Scotland with a large army, and having defeated the Scots near Dunbar, reduced all the southern part of the country (1296). Baliol at once submitted, and was carried a prisoner to London. He was kept in confinement for two years, after which he was allowed to retire to France, where he died in obscurity. Scotland, although subdued for a time, soon found a noble champion in the renowned William Wallace, who defeated an English army of 40,000 men near Stirling, and committed great ravages in the north of England (1297). The next year, however, Edward defeated Wallace in the battle of Falkirk (fawl-kirk), and again established his power in Scotland. Wallace was never afterward able to gain a decisive victory over his country's enemies, although he fought bravely for several years, until, having been betrayed by one of his own countrymen into the power of Edward, that remorseless king sent him to London; and, in order to intimidate the Scottish leaders, caused him to be executed (1305).

43. The people of Scotland, indignant at the oppressions of the English, and at the cruel and ignominious treatment of their illustrious champion Wallace, determined to make another effort to regain their liberties, finding a gallant and patriotic leader in Robert Bruce, son of the competitor of Baliol, who being acknowledged the rightful heir to the throne, had been solemnly crowned in the abbey of Scone. The English were soon driven again from the country; but Edward immediately sent thither a considerable army under Ay'mer de Valence (val-ons'), a skilful general, by whom Bruce, in spite of the most heroic exertions, was defeated, and compelled to take shelter in the western isles. Edward, determined to take vengeance upon the Scots, marched with a great army to the north; but worn out with care and fatigue, fell sick at Carlisle and died (1307). His last injunction to his son and successor was to continue the war until Scotland should be entirely subdued.

44. Edward was one of the ablest and most successful monarchs that ever reigned. He was politic and warlike, and very popular on account of his majestic personal appearance, his military successes, and the efforts which he made to reform and establish the laws. These efforts gained for him the appellation of the "English Justinian." The Great Charter was solemnly confirmed by him in the twenty-fifth year of his reign, although with great reluctance on his part; and he was compelled also to give his formal assent to the principle, so important in the English Constitution, that "no taxes can be lawfully imposed without the consent of parliament." It is very much to the credit of the English, that they were able to wrest these important concessions from so able and vigorous a monarch as Edward I.

45. The people not only made progress in political freedom during this reign, but in general intelligence and social culture. Many discoveries in science and many useful inventions were made by Roger Bacon,* among the latter that of gunpowder, although he failed to adapt it to any practical purpose. Considerable foreign commerce was carried on, chiefly by Germans,* the principal commodities being tin, lead, leather, and wool. The native merchants remonstrating to Edward against permitting "merchant strangers" to settle in the kingdom, he replied that they were of great benefit to the country, and should not be expelled. The trade was, to a considerable extent, carried on at fairs, which often continued for more than a fortnight, and were attended by vast crowds of people, sometimes equalling the population of large cities.

1307 46. Edward II.—"Edward of Caernarvon," so 1327 called from the place of his birth, proved a very unworthy successor of his talented and illustrious father. Disobeying the solemn injunction imposed upon him, he speedily withdrew his forces from Scotland; and thus Robert Bruce was enabled gradually to recover from the English the fortresses which they had seized, and to re-establish the freedom of his country. In the mean time Edward gave himself up to the influence of an unworthy favorite, Gaveston by name, the son of a Gascon knight, brave, accomplished, and of handsome appearance; but of frivolous manners, and very much hated by the English nobles, whom, priding himself upon his power over the king, he treated with haughty disdain.

47. Twice compelled by parliament to banish him from the kingdom, Edward as often recalled him, and restored him to his former wealth and dignity. At length, a confederacy of the nobles being formed to accomplish his ruin, he was captured by their forces, conducted to Warwick Castle, and without trial, or any legal process whatever, beheaded, as an enemy to the kingdom (1312). Edward was at first very indignant at the murder of his favorite, and vowed vengeance against the nobles who had been concerned in its perpetration; but soon afterward granted them a full pardon, on their consenting to supplicate him for it publicly on their knees.

48. Soon after these events the attention of the king was called to the Scots, who, not content with defending their own country, had made successful inroads into England. The union of all parties, after the death of Gaveston, seemed to offer a favorable opportunity to concentrate all the forces of the kingdom against Scotland, and to recover all that had been lost in that country by the lethargy of the king. The castle of Stirling was the only fortress, except Berwick, which the English still retained; and this had long been closely besieged by Edward Bruce, brother of the Scottish king.

49. Thither, with an immense army (100,000 according to the Scotch writers), Edward marched to relieve the garrison; and Robert Bruce, being determined to risk a battle, drew up his forces (about 30,000 in number) at Bannockburn, about two miles from Stirling, where his army was protected by a hill on his right, a morass on his left, and a rivulet on his front. The English advanced with great confidence; but their cavalry were immediately thrown into disorder by an ingenious device of Bruce, who had caused deep pits to be dug in the plain which extended between his army and the rivulet. Before the English army could recover from this disaster, they were dismayed by seeing what appeared to be a second Scottish army coming over the hill, but which was, in fact, only a large number of waggons and servants of the army, whom Bruce had supplied with banners, and stationed behind the hill. The English, panic-stricken, fled from the field, and were pursued with great slaughter till they reached Berwick. The king only escaped capture by taking shelter at Dunbar, whence he sailed to Berwick (ber'rik) (1314). This victory secured the independence of Scotland.

50. The embarrassment of Edward, caused by this severe disaster to his arms, was increased by insurrections in Ireland and Wales; and still further by the factious opposition of the English barons, prominent among whom was the Earl of Lancaster. With no force of character, or capacity for serious business, the king was unable to cope with these difficulties, and weakly surrendered himself to the influence of another favorite, named Spenser, a young man of high rank, engaging appearance and manners, and attractive accomplishments. So extravagant were the honors and authority bestowed by Edward upon this new minion as well as upon his father, that Lancaster and the other great barons, jealous of his influence, combined against him; and raising an army, compelled Parliament to sentence both the Spensers to perpetual exile.

51. The king subsequently succeeded in uniting his friends, and, with a considerable army, proceeded against Lancaster, whom he defeated, and caused to be executed in a very ignominious manner, together with others of the same faction (1322). The Spensers were therefore recalled and invested with increased dignities; but they gave new offence by the arrogance of their demeanor. Edward's queen, Isabella, daughter of Philip the Fair, of France, a woman remarkable for her beauty, but of unrestrained dissoluteness, was especially hostile to these insolent favorites; and she became indignant at the king for his imbecility and neglect. Forming the acquaintance of one Roger Mortimer, she made him her companion and paramour, and entered into a plot for the destruction of the favorites and the dethronement of her husband (1325).

52. The king, deserted by all his subjects, fled into Wales, but was soon obliged to surrender himself a prisoner (1326). Soon afterward, a parliament was called by the queen; and he was formally deposed, and subsequently confined for a time in Kenilworth Castle,* his son Edward being placed on the throne, under a council of regency, although the government was really administered by Isabella and Mortimer (1327). The unfortunate king was afterward removed to Berkeley Castle,† and placed in the power of brutal keepers, who treated him with the most revolting cruelty and insult. At last, by order of Mortimer, these ruffians put him to death in a most shocking manner, and reported that he had died of a violent disease, since they had contrived that his person outwardly should betray no signs of the murderous treatment to which he had been subjected (1327).

1327 53. Edward III. was only fourteen years of age to when he was crowned king; and, the year after, he 1377 was married to Philippa, daughter of the Count of Hainault (ha-no'), having been for some time previously affianced to this princess by his mother, Isabella. During the regency an unsuccessful expedition was undertaken against the Scots; and a disgraceful treaty was entered into with them, Mortimer consenting to give up all claim to homage from the Scottish monarch. This treaty was ratified by Parliament, but created great discontent among the people (1328). The arbitrary conduct of Mortimer, and his insolent usurpation of royal power, made all parties hostile to him; and the young prince, with a spirit and judgment beyond his years, contrived a method to put an end to his rule. With the aid of several of the nobles, he entered the castle occupied by the guilty pair, and seizing Mortimer, had him brought to trial, and being condemned, he was hanged on a gibbet (1330). The queen was kept in close confinement during the remainder of her life.

54. Robert Bruce, who had fully achieved the independence of Scotland, left the throne to his son David, who, at the time of his father's death, was only five years old. Edward, taking advantage of this circumstance, endeavored to depose the young king, so as to place on the throne Edward Baliol, son of the former king of that name; he having agreed to hold it as a vassal of the English monarch. This the Scots resisted, but were severely defeated by Edward in the great battle of Hal'down Hill (1333), and were thus again brought into subjection to the English crown, David having fled from his country and taken refuge in France.

55. Edward's next object of ambition was to acquire possession of the throne of France, circumstances seeming at this time to favor the project; for Charles IV., the French king, having died without heirs, the nation had placed his cousin Philip on the throne. But Edward, through his mother Isabella, was a more direct descendant; and on this ground, notwithstanding that the ancient laws of France (the Salic law—i. e., the law of the Salian Franks) excluded females from the throne, he claimed his right to the succession, and proceeded to vindicate it by force of arms.

56. Having destroyed the French fleet in a great naval battle (1340), he invaded France, and, with forces far inferior to those of Philip, defeated him in the memorable battle of Crecy (kres'e). This battle was made particularly interesting, not only by the greatness of the victory achieved by Edward, but also by the fact that in it cannon were for the first time employed by the English,* and also as the occasion on which the king's son Edward, styled the Black Prince (from the color of his armor), commenced his brilliant military career (1346).

57. Edward next took Calais (Calis), after a siege of nearly twelve months; and having expelled all the inhabitants, peopled it anew with English, thus making it in fact an English city. He also made it an emporium for the four chief commodities of his kingdom—wool, leather, tin, and lead. By this policy he was the means of preserving this city, regarded as the key of France, to his successors for nearly two centuries. While Edward was thus engaged, the Scottish people rallied for the restoration of their independence, and again placed David Bruce upon the throne, who, invading England, was defeated and taken prisoner in the battle of Neville's Cross, near Durham (1346).

58. This victory was in some measure due to the activity and heroism of Queen Philippa, who, previous to the action, rode through the ranks of the army, exhorting every man to do his duty in repelling the invaders of their country. Having caused David to be lodged in the Tower, she joined her husband before Calais, arriving in time to prevent the commission by him of a most ruthless act of cruelty; for he ordered to execution six of the citizens of Calais, who had been sent, on his demand, to make a formal surrender of the city; but was moved from his revengeful purpose by the earnest supplications of his brave and noble queen.

59. A truce was concluded, a short time afterward, be-

* Fire-arms appear to have been used by the Chinese as early as 618 a. c., nearly two thousand years before the battle of Crecy. They were also used in various forms in India; and in the eighth century by the Saracens. The invention of gunpowder is generally attributed to Friar Bacon, who, in 1270, announced its composition; but it was not until 1320 that the proper mode of making it was understood. King Edward's cannon were, of course, very small, being about the size of duck-guns.

tween the French and English monarchs, which was protracted by a dreadful plague that swept away many thousands of the people, not only in England, but in most of the other countries of Europe. This dreadful pestilence first made its appearance in Asia ; and so frightful were its ravages, especially among the lower orders of the people, that in some places scarcely enough of the inhabitants remained alive to till the ground. Above 50,000 persons are said to have perished by it in the city of London alone. The brute creation also suffered from its destructive virulence, vast numbers of cattle dying from the wide-spread contagion (1349).

60. Philip, king of France, having been succeeded by John (1350), and the country being distracted by factious dissensions, Edward, at the expiration of the truce, resolved again to assert his claim to the French throne. Accordingly, the Black Prince sailed to the Garonne (gah-ron') with a fleet of three hundred vessels, containing a large army, with which he invaded the south of France, and, meeting with no opposition, committed the most dreadful ravages, reducing towns and villages to ashes, and laying waste the country wherever his march extended. At the same time, the king himself made a similar incursion from Calais ; but John kept at a distance, not deeming his forces sufficient to risk a battle (1355).

61. The next year, the Black Prince, encouraged by the success of the previous campaign, proceeding from Guienne with an army of about 12,000 men, penetrated into the heart of France ; but at Poitiers (poi-têrz') found himself unexpectedly confronted by a splendidly equipped force of 60,000 men, commanded by John in person. Unable to retreat, and unwilling to risk an engagement with an army so greatly superior to his own, he offered to restore all his conquests and to give up the war, on condition that he might be permitted an honorable retreat; but the French king declining every proposal except that of unconditional surrender, a battle ensued, which, owing to the skill and valor of the Black Prince, resulted in the entire overthrow of the French, John himself being made a prisoner (1356).

62. In accordance with the manners of the times, John was treated by his conqueror with the most chivalric courtesy and respect. He was, however, kept in captivity at London till ransomed by his subjects (1360), when he resumed the throne; but, subsequently, not being able to fulfil the terms of his release, he returned to London, where he died a short time afterward (1364). Under his successor, Charles, the war was renewed between the two countries; but Edward gained no permanent advantage, although the Black Prince displayed all the qualities of an able and enterprising general. The prince was generally very humane; but the town of Limoges (le-môzh'), which had received very many benefits from him, having revolted and taken part with his enemies, he was so much exasperated at the ingratitude of its inhabitants, that on its capture he cruelly caused them to be put to the sword.

63. These events terminated his military career. He returned to England, and, after six years of painful and lingering sickness, caused by incessant toil and exposure, died universally esteemed, not only for his heroism and skill as a military commander, but for the generosity, moderation, and amiability which shed still greater lustre on his character (1376). The king survived him only a year, expiring in the sixty-fifth year of his age, after a reign of more than fifty years (1377).

64. Edward III. was a wise and powerful monarch, popular not only for his military success and prudent administration, but for his many personal accomplishments. He took no important steps without consulting Parliament, refused to pay the tribute to Rome to which John had submitted, and so greatly encouraged trade, that he has been called the "Father of English commerce." Wool was the chief article of export, and an extensive trade was carried on with the ports of the Baltic. During this reign, also, commenced the FIRST ERA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE,—the earliest work in prose, the Travels of Sir John Mandeville, being published about 1360. The famous John Wickliffe and the poets Chaucer (chaw'ser) and Gower also flourished during a part of this reign.

1377 65. Richard II.—Edward III. was succeeded by to his grandson Richard, son of the Black Prince, a 1399 youth eleven years of age; and, at the request of the House of Commons, a council was appointed by the Lords to administer the government, which was presided over by the three uncles of the king, among whom John of Gaunt,* Duke of Lancaster, exercised the chief authority. Hostilities were carried on in France; but little was effected, in consequence of the prudent measures of Charles the Wise. Scotland, under its king, Robert Stuart, the first of that name, was in close alliance with France, and hence shared in the war.

66. To defray the expenses thus incurred, Parliament imposed an unusual tax of three groats on every person, male and female, above fifteen years of age; and this, added to the miseries which the lower orders of the people suffered from the unjust laws of the period, produced an insurrection. The immediate occasion of the outbreak was the indignity with which a young maiden, the daughter of one Wat Tyler (or Wat, the tiler), was treated by one of the brutul tax-gatherers. This outrage so incensed her father, that he struck the officer dead with his hammer, and, being joined by his friends and neighbors, raised a revolt, placing himself at the head of the insurgents (1381).

67. The mutinous populace, amounting to 100,000 men, assembled at Blackheath, near London, under their leaders Wat Tyler and Jack Straw. They were still further excited by one John Ball, an itinerant preacher, who inflamed their minds by depicting the wrongs which were inflicted upon them by the wealthy classes, in depriving them of their natural right to liberty and an equal share in the government.* Thus incensed, they broke into the city, burned the palaces and mansions of the nobles, plundered the warehouses, and murdered the archbishop and many other persons of distinction (1381).

68. The king having entered upon a conference with Wat Tyler, the latter, it is said, acted with so much insolence, that Wal'worth, the mayor of London, struck him with his sword, whereupon Tyler was immediately despatched by others of the king's retinue. Richard, in order to quell the mutiny, acceded to the demands of the insurgents, and they accordingly dispersed; but the nobility having raised a large army, the ringleaders were apprehended and executed, and the concessions of the king were annulled (1381). This made Richard very unpopular with the lower orders, for their demands had been reasonable and just. The most important was, that villenage or slavery should be abolished, the people paying a fixed rent for their lands, instead of being bound to do such services as their feudal lords might require. Serfdom, however, continued to exist in England for more than four centuries after these events.

69. Richard, although displaying so much spirit and courage in these times of disturbance, was afterward characterized by indolence, and a want of judgment and capacity. He quarrelled with the great officers and distinguished nobles of his court, and gave his entire confidence to unworthy favorites. He had banished his cousin Henry, son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, for being concerned in a duel; and, on the death of the duke, proceeded to dispossess Henry of his estates and annex them to those of the crown. Henry, however, taking advantage of Richard's absence in Ireland, landed in England with a small force; and so unpopular had the king become, that the invader was soon joined by a force of 60,000 men.

70. Richard, deserted by every one, after wandering for some time among the mountains of Wales, was obliged to surrender himself, and was carried a prisoner to the Tower. With the most abject pusillanimity, he resigned the crown to Henry, and was formally deposed by Parliament, who placed Henry on the throne (1399). Richard, according to the English historians, died of starvation* after a few months' imprisonment (1400). During this reign, Wickliffe,† called by some the "Morning Star of the Reformation," translated the Bible. He and his doctrines were much favored by John of Gaunt. Chaucer,‡ styled the "Father of English Poetry," who wrote the celebrated poem, "The Canterbury Tales," was a follower of Wickliffe.

* The French historians state that he was murdered by violent means; but some of the Scotch writers assert that he escaped from confinement and fled to the Western Isles of Scotland; and there being recognised, he was carried to the court of the Scottish king, where he lived for some years, and died at Stirling in 1419.

† Wickliffe advocated many of the doctrines which were afterward preached by Luther and his followers, in the sixteenth century. His disciples were called Lollards. He died in 1384.

‡ Chaucer was born in 1328, it is supposed, and died a short time after the deposition of Richard II., in 1400. His poems are characterized by vigor and fertility of imagination, and great dramatic power. His prose writings have also very superior merit.

STATE OF SOCIETY UNDER THE PLANTAGENETS.

71. The most important of all the changes that took place during this period was the institution of the House of Commons. It gave the death-blow to the feudal system, by conferring upon the vassal some of the political rights enjoyed by his superior. The English monarchs constantly sought to evade the provisions of Magna Charta, but without success; for no less than thirty-eight times were they compelled to ratify it. By this great fundamental law, private property and personal liberty were equally protected, it being clearly provided that the king could levy no money without the consent of Parliament. This clause, sometimes omitted in the ratification of the Charter, was fully established during the reign of Edward I.

72. Trial by jury, during this period, took the place of the "judicial combat" of the Normans. The Great Charter prescribed "the legal judgment of his peers" as necessary for the condemnation of one accused of crime; but in the reign of Henry II., a person unwilling to risk a judicial combat might refer the case to four knights chosen by the sheriff, who, in their turn, selected twelve more. In the reign of Henry III., the employment of twelve jurors to decide cases was often resorted to; but these were witnesses as well as judges, and it was not until some time afterward that jurymen were made exclusively judges, deciding the case solely on the testimony of others.

73. Although so much had been accomplished toward laying the foundation of English liberty, the condition of the common people was very little improved. A degrading system of serfdom continued to exist. Slaves were bought and sold at the fairs, and it is said that the price of a man was less than that paid for a horse. The modes of living among the higher classes had, however, become more refined. Glass windows, vessels of earthenware, the use of coal for fire and of candles for light enlarged their means of comfort; the appearance of their dwellings was improved by the substitution of tiles for straw thatch. The furniture was still scanty and uncouth.

74. The costume of the period was curious and fantastic. Long pointed shoes, with the toes fastened to the knees or the girdle; stockings of different colors; a coat half blue or black, half white, with trousers reaching scarcely to the knees, were some of the most prominent peculiarities in the dress of the fine gentlemen. The ladies wore party-colored tunics, very short tippets, small caps, and girdles ornamented with gold and silver, in which they carried two small swords. Their trains were very long; and their head-dresses towered sometimes two feet above their heads, and were decked at the summit with waving ribbons of various colors.

75. Wool was the most important article of commerce; and in this traffic the king himself did not disdain to take part. On this account Edward III. was called by his French rival, in derision, the "Royal wool-merchant." This, with the other commodities, was sold principally to the German traders, who imported gold, silver, silks, wines, spices, and other luxuries in return. Agriculture was carried on in a very rude manner, being left to the lowest classes; although Edward I. did not disdain to insert in a book of laws, issued during his reign, a series of directions as to the manner of tilling the soil. Horticulture received considerable attention, every house of the better class having a garden or "pleasance;" while the monasteries had besides, a "herberie" or physic garden attached to them, for the growth of herbs used in medicines.

74. Costume? Dress of the gentlemen? Of the ladies?

75. Traffic in wool? The German traders? Agriculture? Horticulture?

76. Science made some progress during this period. Roger Bacon applied the learning which he had acquired at Oxford to the discovery of useful knowledge. Besides the composition of gunpowder, he made many other discoveries, and invented various mathematical and philosophical instruments. His wonderful knowledge made the people regard him as a magician; and he was consequently thrown into prison, where he was kept many years. Astrology was the favorite study of these times, not only in England but in most other countries of Europe. The astrologer was supposed to be able to foretell future events by observing the appearances of the heavenly bodies; and it was a long time before the futility of this pretence was discovered. The constant observations of the astrologers, and the construction of instruments required for making them, led to improvement in the science of astronomy.

77. Learning made, nevertheless, but little advancement, and was still confined to the clergy; for the attention of the higher classes of the laity was absorbed in the pursuits of war and hunting. There were no books except such as had been prepared with great expense of time and labor in the writing-rooms of the monasteries; and these brought a very high price, as much as $200 being paid for a copy of the Bible. Toward the close of the period, the English mind began to awaken from its bondage; and literature sprang into existence, being ushered in by those great lights,—Geoffrey Chaucer and John Wickliffe. The language of these writers differs considerably from modern English, and is therefore difficult to read. It is called "Middle English," since it comes between the "Semi-Saxon," which preceded it, and modern English, which commenced during the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

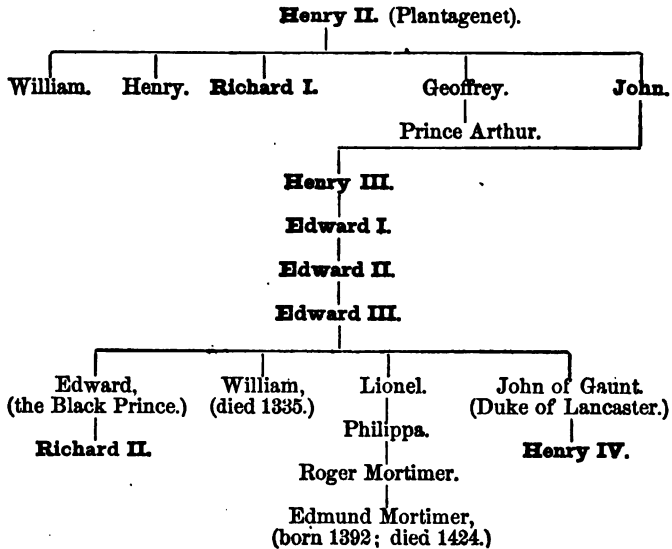

76. Science? Roger Bacon? Astrology? To what did its cultivation lead?

SECTION IV.

THE HOUSES OF LANCASTER AND YORK.

Extending from the Accession of Henry IV. (1399) to that of Henry VII. (1485).

1399 1. Henry IV., son of John of Gaunt, the fourth to son of Edward III., had been declared king by Par-1413 liament; but the rightful heir was Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, the great-grandson of Li'onel, the third son of Edward III. (see Genealogical Table). This prince, a child of seven years, was detained in custody at Windsor Castle by Henry. A few months after the accession of the latter, a conspiracy was formed to restore Richard to the throne; but it failed, and those concerned in it were executed (1400). This probably led to the murder of the deposed monarch. Henry, in order to protect the Church from the danger of heresy, caused severe laws to be passed against the Lollards; and one of them (a clergyman) was condemned and burnt at the stake (1401). This was the first English subject who was put to death on account of his religious opinions.

2. Repeated conspiracies formed a striking feature of this reign. The most formidable was that excited by the Earl of Northumberland and his son, Harry Percy, surnamed Hotspur, on account of his fiery temper. This young nobleman had acquired great fame, during the preceding reign, by his exploits in a skirmish with the Scots, at Otterbourn (1388), on which battle was founded the famous ballad of "Chevy Chase." The Percies had also greatly aided Henry in his efforts to obtain possession of the kingdom; but afterward, quarrelling with him, they joined their forces to those of the Scots under the Earl of Douglas, and to the Welsh under Owen Glendower, with the object of placing Mortimer on the throne. Richard Scrope, archbishop of York, was also engaged in the conspiracy.

3. A terrific battle was fought near Shrewsbury (1403); but the rebels were defeated, and Percy, their brave leader, was slain. The king and his son took part in the battle, and signalized themselves by their feats of strength and daring. Some of the conspirators were taken prisoners and executed; but the Earl of Northumberland was pardoned. Two years afterward, the latter, with the archbishop of York and others, again rose in rebellion; but they were unsuccessful, and the archbishop, with some of the other conspirators, was executed (1405). This was the first instance in English history of the execution of an archbishop. Northumberland escaped into Scotland; but subsequently, invading England with a hostile force, he was defeated and slain.

4. The other events of this reign are of little importance. Henry IV. died in 1413, having lost many years previously the great popularity by means of which he had been enabled to obtain the crown. His reign was beneficial to England; for the Commons acquired a considerable increase of power, especially in connection with the granting of supplies for the support of the government. He was succeeded by his son Henry.

1413 5. Henry V., during his father's life, had been . to noted for his riotous and disorderly conduct; and 1422 had, on one occasion, been committed to prison by the chief-justice, whom he had insulted for indicting one of his dissolute companions. On his accession, however, he dismissed his profligate associates, and thoroughly reformed his life, retaining in office the wise ministers of his father, including Gascoigne (gas'koin), the chief-justice by whom he had been so fearlessly punished. Among his first acts was the persecution of the Lollards, now a numerous party; and their leader, Lord Cobham, with many others, was condemned and executed.

6. Henry next made an attack upon France, which he hoped to subdue; because, during the lunacy of its king, Charles VI., it was distracted by disputes as to who should have the regency. Having taken Har'fleur, after a long siege, he found his army so much reduced that he resolved to return to England. On his march to Calais, however, he was surprised by the French army at Agincourt, and was obliged to risk an engagement, although the enemy's forces were more than four times as numerous as his own. The result was very disastrous to the French, 10,000 of their army being slain, and 14,000 taken prisoners; while the English are said to have lost only forty (1415). Henry was not in a condition to take immediate advantage of this great victory, and, with his prisoners, proceeded to England, and concluded a truce with the enemy.

7. Two years afterward, he again invaded France, and after some successes, made a treaty at Troyes (trwah) with the imbecile King Charles, according to which he was to marry Charles's daughter Catharine, to have the present administration of the French government, and on the death of Charles, to succeed to the throne (1420). The terms of this extraordinary treaty were fulfilled; and Henry, proclaimed regent of France, entered Paris in triumph. His glory was, however, of short duration; for being attacked by a fatal malady, he expired, in the thirty-fifth year of his age and the tenth of his reign, leaving the throne to his son Henry, then an infant less than one year old (1422).

6. What led to the invasion of France? Give an account of it. Battle of Agincourt? Its result?

7. What led to the treaty of Troyes? (Situation of Troyes? See map of France.) Terms of the treaty? How fulfilled? Death of Henry? His successor?

8. The premature death of Henry V. was a great loss to the kingdom; for his abilities, both as a statesman and a soldier, were of a very high order; and though his ambition was excessive, it was unalloyed with those vices by which this passion is so often stained. The personal appearance and manners of the king were such as became his exalted character and station, and he excelled in all warlike and manly exercises. None of the princes of the house of Lancaster ventured to impose taxes without the consent of Parliament; and so far their imperfect title to the throne favored the progress of political freedom in England.

1492 9. Henry VI.—At the commencement of this to reign, Parliament appointed the Duke of Bedford, 1461 elder brother of the late king, protector of England, upon whom was also conferred by Charles VI. the regency of France. The French king, however, died a few months afterward; and his son Charles, an energetic and popular prince, boldly asserted his claim to the throne, and was crowned at Poitiers. A war of many years ensued, under the conduct of Bedford, who was not only an accomplished prince, but a most skilful general and statesman. In order to divert the power of Scotland from the support of Charles, the Scottish king, James I.,* who had been for several years a prisoner in England, was restored to the throne of his ancestors.

10. After several campaigns, which though indecisive, had reduced Charles to very great distress, Bedford resolved to invade the south of France; and with this object, laid siege to Orleans, a city which was loyal to the French

* This prince, in a voyage to France, whither he had been sent to save him from the wicked wiles of his uncle, the Duke of Albany, who had seized the government of Scotland, was taken by the English, and was detained for nineteen years prisoner in England. He was treated kindly, educated with care; and during his captivity he wrote several beautiful poems.

monarch. This siege was continued for many months, and the French had given up all hope of successfully repelling their assailants, when their deliverance was effected by one of the most extraordinary occurrences recorded in history. Joan of Arc, a simple peasant girl, had been told of a prophecy to the effect that France could only be delivered from its enemies by a virgin; and the idea became impressed upon her mind that to herself had been divinely committed the task of effecting this great object.

11. She soon induced others to believe in the truth of her mission, among them the king himself and his chief officers, and was admitted into Orleans, arrayed in armor, and provided with a train of attendants. Under her leadership the French seemed to be inspired with almost superhuman courage; and the English, struck with terror, were soon obliged to raise the siege (1429). She next urged the king to march to Rheims (reemz), in order to assume the crown of his ancestors according to the accustomed rites; and this being triumphantly achieved, she demanded to be dismissed, considering her mission at an end.

12. The French, however, selfishly detained her: and a short time afterward she fell into the power of the English, who cruelly caused her to be burnt to death in the market-place of Rouen (roo'en), on a charge of sorcery and impiety (1431). But nothing was gained by this ruthless execution of the "Maid of Orleans." The Duke of Bedford died (1435), and Charles was enabled to re-enter his capital, after having been excluded from it for twenty years (1437). The English continued to suffer defeat, until finally this long war was interrupted by a truce which lasted six years (1444).

12. Further history of the Maid of Orleans? Of the English invasion?

13. Henry, on arriving at the age of majority, showed neither the capacity nor the disposition to take control of the government, which, since the death of Bedford, had been administered by the Duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle, and by Cardinal Beaufort, his guardian. Through the influence of the latter, the king married Margaret of Anjou, one of the most beautiful and accomplished princesses of the age, and well suited by the masculine energy of her character to supply the defects and weaknesses of her husband (1444). By the terms of the marriage treaty Margaret's father, the Duke of Anjou, was to receive from the English king a large sum of money, and the cession of Maine and Anjou, provinces which had been conquered by the English at great cost of life and treasure.

14. The protector Gloucester having violently opposed this treaty, became an object of great dislike to Margaret, and through her contrivance was arrested on a charge of treason. Previous to the day appointed for his trial, he was found dead in his bed; and the Duke of Suffolk, a favorite of the queen's, was chosen his successor, as the king by his increased imbecility had become entirely unfit to administer the government. The Duke of York was succeeded as regent of France by another of Margaret's favorites, the Duke of Somerset, under whom the English lost all their French possessions except Calais (1451).

15. The death of the virtuous Duke of Gloucester, generally styled by the people "the good duke Humphrey," together with the disgraceful losses of territory in France, caused intense popular indignation against the queen and her minister Suffolk. The latter was impeached by the Commons, and the king, to save his life, banished him from the kingdom; but on his passage to France, he was seized by order of his enemies, and executed. The misconduct of the government also led to an insurrection of the lower orders, under a leader named Jack Cade; but it was soon put down, Cade being slain (1450).

16. The total incapacity of the king, and the disorders which it occasioned in the government, induced many of the people to favor the claims of Richard, Duke of York, to the throne, in right of his descent from the third son of Edward III. Richard was a man of vigor and ability, and though greatly disliked by the queen, had obtained the appointment of Protector of the Realm, in opposition to his rival the Duke of Somerset, the favorite of the queen and her party. The latter, however, afterward triumphed, and Richard was compelled to resign his office.

17. Richard and his adherents then raised an army, ostensibly for the redress of grievances; and in the battle of St. Albans defeated the royalists, and took the king prisoner (1455). This was the first conflict in that great civil war, styled the "War of the Roses" (from the badges worn by the respective parties, the Lancastrians wearing a red rose and the Yorkists a white rose),—a war which lasted thirty years, and was signalized by twelve pitched battles; which deluged England with blood, and in which the ancient nobility of the kingdom were almost annihilated.

18. The next year after the battle of St. Albans the king was restored to his authority; but the contest soon broke out with increased fury, and in the battle of Northampton (1460) the king was defeated and taken prisoner by the Earl of Warwick (commonly called, from subsequent events, the "king-maker").* After the battle of Northampton the Duke of York was proclaimed the lawful successor of Henry; and Edward, the son of Henry and Margaret, was excluded from the throne. The administration of the government was, meanwhile, to be committed to the Duke of York.

19. The queen, however, fled to Scotland, and, with the aid of the northern barons, raised a large army, with which, in the battle of Wakefield, she defeated the Duke of York, who was taken prisoner and put to death with great ignominy. By the order of Margaret his head was cut off and fixed on the gates of York, with a paper crown upon it, in derision of his claim to royalty. Other cruelties were perpetrated by the victorious Lancastrians. A few weeks after this, Margaret defeated the Earl of Warwick in the second battle of St. Albans, and thus regained possession of the king; but Edward, son of the late Duke of York, joining his forces with those of Warwick, compelled her to retreat, and triumphantly entering London, was proclaimed king, under the title of Edward IV. (1461).

20. This virtually ended the reign of Henry VI.,—a monarch who commenced life with the most splendid prospects, inheriting not only his father's extensive dominions in England and France, but the love and admiration with which the martial glory of that prince had inspired the English people. With an inoffensive disposition, and many virtues that might have adorned a private station, his unfitness for the exercise of regal sway, especially in so stormy a period, plunged the nation into a civil war, during the progress of which he became the mere sport of fortune, tossed to and fro by the contending parties. As the founder of Eton College, and of King's College* at Cambridge, he has, however, left some claim to the respect and gratitude of posterity.

* Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, was the most powerful of England's feudal barons. His vassals formed a vast army; and so numerous were his retainers, that he is said to have feasted daily, at his various manors and castles, upward of 30,000 persons, while the whole population of the kingdom is estimated to have been at that time only about two and a half millions. Warwick was the Duke of York's brother-in-law.

1461 21. Edward IV.—Young Edward had acquired to the throne chiefly through the exertions of Warwick, 1483 and his character and talents were such as enabled him to retain it. He was bold, active, and enterprising, and pursued his enemies with the most unrelenting vengeance. Queen Margaret was, however, not entirely subdued. She succeeded in collecting an army of 60,000 men in the northern counties, with which she encountered the forces of Edward and Warwick, in the terrific battle of Tow'ton; but was totally defeated, nearly one-half of her entire army being slain, either in the battle or the pursuit, Edward having issued orders that no quarter should be given (1461).

22. Margaret having fled with her husband into Scotland, Edward returned to London; and a parliament being summoned, his title to the throne was solemnly recognized and confirmed. Three years afterward, Margaret made another effort to recover her lost kingdom, with a small army obtained from Louis XI. of France; but she was defeated in two battles, and with great difficulty succeeded in making her escape (1464). Henry, after remaining concealed for a year, was at last discovered, and being delivered into the power of Edward, was imprisoned in the Tower.

23. Edward's vices, however, and his marriage with Elizabeth Gray, a Lancastrian knight's widow, upon whose relatives the infatuated monarch showered all his favors, so disgusted the brave and high-spirited Warwick, that he

* The chapel of King's College is a very beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture.—so beautiful, indeed, that it is said Sir Christopher Wren, the renowned architect, went once every year to contemplate it. deserted the cause of Edward, and formed an alliance with Margaret. After obtaining a supply of men and money from the king of France, he landed at Dartmouth; and so popular was the earl, that in a few days he collected an army of 60,000 men, and having compelled Edward to flee, took the imprisoned Henry from the Tower and proclaimed him king. This act was ratified by Parliament, and the regency was intrusted to Warwick and his son-in-law, the Duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV. (1471).

24. Disaster soon followed this great victory; for Edward landing in England with a small force, was soon joined by an immense army; and regaining possession of London, he once more made the hapless Henry a prisoner, and marched against Warwick, who had taken a position at Bar'net, in the neighborhood of London. The king-maker, deserted by his son-in-law, the Duke of Clarence, who, with a considerable force, went over to the Yorkists, was defeated and slain, fighting on foot and in the thickest of the engagement (1471).

25. On the same day Margaret landed in England with her son Edward, and advanced into the country, increasing her army as she proceeded. At Tewks'bury, however, she was overtaken by Edward; and her army being entirely defeated, she and her son were made prisoners. The young prince was cruelly put to death by the Dukes of Clarence and Gloster, brothers of the king; and Margaret herself was imprisoned in the Tower. A few days after the battle, Henry expired in the Tower, according to general belief, by the murderous hand of the wicked and cruel Duke of Gloster. Queen Margaret afterward found a refuge in France, where she died (1482).

guished; and Edward, being secure on the throne, gave himself up to every species of vice and debauchery. He caused his brother, the Duke of Clarence, to be put to death on a charge of treason, being probably instigated to this crime by his younger brother Richard, Duke of Gloster,—a prince noted for his designing character and unrelenting ambition. Edward was about to engage in a war with France, when he was seized with a distemper, of which he died (1483).

27. During this reign, the art of printing was introduced into England by William Caxton, who, after having acquired a practical knowledge of the art in Holland and Germany, returned to his own country and set up a printing-press at Westminster. The first book printed in England by him was one entitled "The Game and Playe of Chesse" (1474). The types used by him were such as were employed in Germany; and all English books continued to be printed in such letters (called black-letter) until the reign of James I., when they were superseded by the Roman characters. King Edward greatly encouraged trade and manufactures, particularly in wool. The Feudal System, by the destruction of the ancient nobility, during the War of the Roses, almost entirely disappeared.

28. Edward V., the eldest son of the late king, a youth of twelve years, was proclaimed king; and his uncle Richard, Duke of Gloster, was appointed Protector. This artful and wicked prince, obtaining possession of the young king and his brother, the Duke of York, placed them in the Tower, and caused Lord Rivers, their maternal uncle, and Lord Hastings, with several other distinguished persons, to be executed on a charge of treason. He then gave out that the young princes were illegitimate; and contrived that some of his friends should publicly solicit him to take the crown, which, with pretended reluctance, he accepted, and was proclaimed king, under the title of Richard III. (1483).

29. Richard III.—The first act of this wicked usurper was to destroy the two young princes, who are supposed to have been smothered in their beds, in the Tower, by his orders. The Duke of Buckingham, through whose assistance he had gained the object of his ambition, was loaded with honors; but he soon became disgusted with the tyranny of Richard, and entered into a conspiracy to dethrone him and place Henry Tudor, Earl of Richmond, on the throne. This prince was a Lancastrian, being descended, on his mother's side, from John of Gaunt; on his father's he was grandson of Sir Owen Tudor, who had married Catharine, the widow of Henry V.

30. Buckingham took up arms in Wales, with the expectation that his accomplices would raise an insurrection in other parts of the kingdom; but in this being disappointed, he was deserted by his followers, and obliged to conceal himself for safety. He was, however, soon discovered; and being brought to the king, was immediately beheaded (1483). Richard, everywhere triumphant over his enemies, summoned a parliament, and obtained from it a recognition of his title. In order still further to strengthen it, he resolved to espouse Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV.; to accomplish which, he caused his consort, Anne, to be poisoned. This unfortunate princess was the second daughter of the great Earl of Warwick, and had been married to Margaret's son, the hapless Edward, whom Richard had slain at Tewksbury.

31. These abominable crimes excited universal detestation against the usurper; and Henry, Earl of Richmond, being invited into the kingdom, sailed from Normandy, and landed at Milford Haven with a small force. Re-enforcements flocked to him from all parts, as he advanced toward Shrewsbury; and at Bosworth he was opposed by Richard, at the head of forces double in number those of his own. A fierce battle ensued; but Richard, being deserted by Lord Stanley and a large part of his army, was defeated and slain while fighting desperately in the conflict. The Earl of Richmond was crowned king on the battlefield, with the title of HENRY VII., by Sir William Stanley, brother of Lord Stanley (1485).

· 32. The body of Richard was buried at Leicester; but, at the destruction of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII., it was exhumed, and the stone coffin in which it had been interred was long used as a horse-trough at an inn in that town. Richard was brave and sagacious; and had he been the rightful occupant of the throne, there is reason to think he would have adorned it by great and worthy deeds. His ruling passion, ambition, was boundless; and he stopped at no crime that seemed necessary to secure its gratification. It must, however, be borne in mind that his character has been drawn by historians who wrote in the interests and praise of the Tudors; and that, therefore, his acts have been represented in the worst possible light. The stories told of the deformity of his person, and which the genius of Shakspeare has served to strengthen and preserve, are doubtless gross exaggerations. He was a patron of learning, bestowing many benefactions on the universities, and affording encouragement to the newly-invented art of printing. He also sought to protect the interests of English merchants in foreign countries, by appointing consuls, and established postal facilities by the appointment of couriers for the speedy transmission of news.

STATE OF SOCIETY UNDER THE HOUSES OF LANCASTER AND YORK.

33. This period was characterized by civil commotions, the result of which was to introduce great changes in the political and social character of the nation. One of the most important of these was the extinction of villanage, or serfdom. The nobles being obliged to arm their serfs in the "Wars of the Roses," could never thereafter compel them to return to a state of servitude. Besides, the ancient nobility having nearly all perished in these long wars, feudalism was destroyed, and a sounder and more liberal system took its place.

34. In other respects, these wars suspended for a time the march of improvement. Agriculture was necessarily very much neglected; and consequently widespread famine was a frequent calamity, the lower classes being sometimes obliged to live upon roots and herbs. Large tracts of land which had been carefully tilled were converted into pasturage for sheep, in order that the grain of foreign countries might be purchased with the wool thus obtained. Hence it has been remarked, that the Wars of the Roses did not check the commercial prosperity of the country. Many of the merchants amassed great wealth, and were thus enabled, by large loans, to relieve the necessities of their sovereign. To this period belongs the famous Whittington, who was "thrice Lord Mayor of London,"* and who, according to the story, commenced his fortunate career with the possession of only a cat.

35. The most prominent innovation in manufactures was the introduction of silk-making; and in 1455 a statute was passed to protect those engaged in it from the destructive competition of the Lombard merchants, by checking their importations. The fisheries, also, commenced to receive a very large share of attention. On the eastern coast, the herring-fisheries became exceedingly valuable; and at Yarmouth an annual fair was held for trade in this fish, which attracted ships from many ports of Europe.

36. Science received some additions, being cultivated at the schools especially established in the two universities for the various departments, such as astronomy, chemistry or alchemy, mathematics, etc. The methods and objects of research were, however, very fanciful. Thus, the alchemist expended all his energies in searching for the Philosopher's Stone—a substance that would transmute into gold all the other metals; the physician, instead of carefully observing the phenomena connected with diseases, and by means of careful experiment discovering remedies for them, spent all his time in trying to find the Elixir of Life—a universal remedy. These fanciful notions, however, prompted to experiment and observation, and thus led to the discovery of useful scientific knowledge.

37. The great event of this period was the introduction of printing. By means of it the printed black-letter volume took the place of the expensive manuscript; and thus books became much cheaper, and learning more widely diffused. New schools and colleges sprang into existence; and the education of the scholar began to assume some degree of respectability, when contrasted with the training of the knight or the soldier. This also led to a greater degree of refinement in the language, which gradually approached the character of modern English. The want of a standard of orthography, however, greatly retarded its progress. No two authors spelled alike; and an author often spelled the same word differently on the same page.

36. Science? The principal objects of research? To what did this lead?
37. Printing? Effects of its introduction? Orthography?

38. Dramatic performances began to be of a more regular character. They were acted chiefly by the clergy, being designed to teach the lower classes the Bible history; and hence such subjects were chosen as The Creation,—The Flood,—The Birth of Christ, etc. These were called Mysteries, or Miracle Plays. They were succeeded, in the reign of Henry VI., by the Moral Plays, the object of which was to impress upon the minds of the spectators the excellence of virtue, by means of the representation of ingenious allegories. The performers in these plays were laymen, and personated Mercy, Truth, Justice, etc.

39. Architecture was not encouraged as much as during the preceding period; but many changes in the mode of building houses were introduced. The feudal castles being swept away in the storm of war, large manor-houses of wood took their places. These were decorated with much carving and painting, and the rooms were adorned with tapestry. The furniture was, however, still scanty, and of clumsy form, although considerably improved. The bed furniture appears to have been comparatively luxurious.

PART III.

MODERN ENGLAND.

SECTION I.

THE TUDOR FAMILY.

Extending from the Accession of Henry VII. (1485) to that of James I. (1603).

1485 1. Henry VII.—The decisive victory which to Henry had gained at Bosworth gave him the 1509 throne, but he had no legal title to it. He was, however, prudent and vigorous; and as he foresaw that he would have many difficulties to contend with in consequence of the popularity of the house of York, he determined to show all opponents that nothing but successful war would avail to dethrone him. His first acts showed much partisan jealousy and hatred. The young Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, and grandson of the "King-maker," he caused to be kept securely in the Tower; and though he had promised to marry the princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV., he delayed the nuptials for some months, greatly to the dissatisfaction of the nation, eager by this union to remove all occasion for civil dissensions.

2. A rumor having spread among the people that the Earl of Warwick had escaped from the Tower and was lying concealed in some part of England, a priest of Oxford, named Simon, brought forward a handsome youth, whose real name was Lambert Simnel, but who had been trained by Simon to personate the young earl. He took him to Ireland, where the people received him with joy, and proclaimed him king, under the title of Edward VI.; and although the king, in order to prevent the insurrection from spreading in England, exhibited the real earl of Warwick in public, the impostor still retained his adherents in Ireland. He also received from the duchess of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV., the aid of two thousand veteran soldiers from Germany (1487).

3. The cause of Simnel was likewise supported by John, Earl of Lincoln, nephew of Edward IV., under whose leadership the insurgents landed in England; but having advanced as far as Stoke, were met by an army under Henry and entirely defeated, Lincoln being slain in the battle. Simnel was taken prisoner, and being too contemptible to excite the resentment of the king, was pardoned, and made a scullion in the royal kitchen. Simon, being a priest, was punished only by imprisonment (1487).

4. Five years afterward, a more formidable attempt was made by the enemies of the king to raise a pretender to the throne, by counterfeiting Richard, Duke of York, the younger of the two sons of Edward IV., who were generally believed to have been murdered in the Tower. The person selected for this purpose was a young man named Perkin Warbeck, the son of a Flemish merchant, of comely appearance, graceful and courtly address, and sprightly intelligence in conversation. He first assumed the name of Richard Plantagenet in Ireland, and many partisans of the York family at once flocked to his standard.

5. Charles, king of France, being engaged in war with England, invited him to Paris, and treated him with all the respect due to the prince whom he personated ; but having made peace with Henry, he dismissed him from the French court. The adventurer then proceeded to the Duchess of Burgundy, by whom he was most cordially welcomed and acknowledged, receiving from her the appellation of the White Rose of England (1493). These circumstances induced very many persons in England to believe that Warbeck was actually the Duke of York.

6. Henry, on this account, endeavored to obtain positive evidence of the murder of the duke and his brother ; but in this he was unsuccessful, since the remains of the princes had been removed by Richard, and therefore could not be found.* Several of Warbeck's adherents in England were executed for treason, among them Sir William Stanley, who had crowned Henry at Bosworth, after having saved his life in the battle ; the only crime of this nobleman being that he had said privately that, if he were sure the young man was really King Edward's son, he would never bear arms against him (1495).

7. After making a fruitless attempt to raise an insurrection in Ireland, Perkin proceeded to Scotland, where he was acknowledged by the king, James IV., who gave him the noble lady Catherine Gordon in marriage, and made an invasion of England on his account. The people, however, refused to receive the pretender ; and, after making another unsuccessful attempt in Cornwall, Perkin gave himself up, and was imprisoned in the Tower (1497). There he became acquainted with the Earl of Warwick, and arranged with him a plan of escape ; but the plot was discovered, and both were executed—Perkin being hanged at Tyburn, and the unfortunate prince beheaded on Tower Hill. By this act of cruelty Henry destroyed the last male descendant of the Plantagenets (1499).

8. Henry was a prudent monarch, and very much averse to war, principally because it prevented the gratification of his ruling passion, avarice. In order to increase his hoards, he resorted to the most unjust and tyrannical exactions; and two lawyers, named Empson and Dudley, gained an infamous notoriety by acting as instruments of his rapacity. His treasures amounted at his death to almost two millions sterling—an enormous sum at that period. He died after a reign of twenty-four years, and was succeeded by his second son, Henry (1509), his eldest son, Arthur, having died some years before.

9. This reign was fortunate for the people of England; for the civil commotions which threatened the peace of the country being repressed by Henry's wise and vigorous administration, general prosperity prevailed, commerce and manufactures were promoted, and the arts of peace flourished. He commissioned John and Sebastian Cabot, Venetians settled in Bristol, by whom the mainland of North America was first reached (1497), the year before that of South America was discovered by Columbus.* Henry also showed his interest in maritime affairs by causing a very large vessel, called the "Great Harry," to be built for naval purposes. This may be considered the foundation of the English navy, since the government previous to this time only used such merchant ships as could be hired or forcibly taken for its service.

* It is said that Henry was prevented by an accident from participating in the honor connected with the discovery of America. Columbus, discouraged by the many repulses with which he met at other Courts sent Bartholomew to England to solicit aid: but before this could be obtained, Columbus received assistance from Queen Isabella of Spain, and accomplished the enterprise.

1509 10. Henry VIII.—The accession of this king to was hailed by the people with great rejoicing. His 1547 father had, long before his death, lost to a considerable extent their respect and affection; but the young prince, now in his eighteenth year, was remarkable for personal beauty, affability and ease of address, and both mental and bodily accomplishments. Soon after his accession, he married Catharine of Aragon, his brother Arthur's widow, to whom he had been betrothed since his eleventh year.
 One of his first acts was to redress the grievances of those who had suffered from the unjust exactions of the late king; and Empson and Dudley were tried, convicted, and executed.

11. Desirous of military glory, he entered into an alliance with the Pope, Spain, and Venice, against Louis XII. of France; but in the first campaign the English army, under the Marquis of Dorset, was unsuccessful (1511). Henry then determined to invade the French territories with an overwhelming force. He landed at Calais with an army of nearly 50,000 men, and was joined by the Emperor of Germany, Maximilian, who, enlisting in his army, assumed the cross of St. George, and received the usual pay of a captain.
 The English forces having advanced a short distance, were met by the French cavalry; but the latter, at the sight of the enemy, were seized with a singular panic, and disgracefully fled. In the pursuit many officers of distinction were made prisoners (1513). This affair was called, in derision, the "Battle of the Spurs."

12. Instead of improving this victory by marching on Paris, Henry allowed himself to be delayed by the siege of some inconsiderable towns, and soon afterward returned to England. In the mean time, the Scots, who had formed an alliance with Louis, invaded England with a large army, under their king, James; but at Flodden Field were met by an English force inferior in numbers, under the Earl of Surrey. The battle was long and desperate, and resulted in the defeat of the Scots, 5,000 of whom, including their king and the flower of the Scottish nobility, were left dead on the field (1513).

13. Henry's favorite minister at this time was Thomas Wolsey (wool'ze), who, from a very humble origin, had advanced successively to the highest honors. With varied and extensive learning, a genius for statesmanship, and all the wit and gayety necessary in an accomplished courtier, he soon gained an unbounded influence over the young English monarch; and in his magnificent equipage and gorgeous attire he outshone even the king himself. From being bishop of Lincoln, he was made archbishop of York, and subsequently appointed by the Pope a cardinal (1515). Foreign princes sued for the favor and courted the smiles of this haughty minister and prelate; but he was careful, by pretending a complete submission to the will of his own sovereign, to conceal the extraordinary influence which he had acquired over him.

14. On the death of the Emperor Maximilian, Henry was tempted to make some effort to obtain the vacant throne of Germany, but found that the votes of the electors were engaged either to Francis, king of France, or Charles of Spain. The latter was ultimately successful, and thus became the greatest potentate of Europe; since not only Spain and Germany, but the Netherlands, a part of Italy, and the recently-discovered regions of the New World, yielded obedience to his sway (1519). Francis retired from the contest, filled with chagrin and disappointment; and in order to strengthen himself against the power of his great rival, planned an alliance with the English king (1520).

15. For the purpose of effecting this, the two kings met at a place near Calais; and a fortnight was passed in the interview, the whole time being spent in tournaments and other entertainments of the most magnificent character (1520). So gorgeous was the display on both sides, under the management of Wolsey, that the place of meeting was called the "Field of the Cloth of Gold." The treaty which was made was, however, soon broken; for Charles had artfully gained over Cardinal Wolsey to his interests by promising his influence to secure for the ambitious minister the papal throne on the death of the reigning pontiff (Leo X.).

16. Martin Luther having caused great excitement in Europe by the promulgation of his doctrines, Henry, who had been carefully educated in the faith of the Catholic church, wrote a treatise in defence of it, and dedicated it to the Pope, who, as a recompense, conferred on the royal author the title of "Defender of the Faith" (1521). This was one of the last acts of the pontificate of Leo X., his death occurring before the close of the year. He was succeeded by Adrian VI., greatly to the disappointment of Wolsey. The cardinal, however, was soothed by renewed promises on the part of the emperor, who paid a visit to England in order to confirm the friendship of Henry and his haughty minister (1522).

17. In pursuance of the agreement made with Charles, war was waged with France, but no success attended the English arms; and the king was embarrassed by the want of funds, Parliament refusing to comply with his demands, in spite of the most strenuous efforts on the part of Wolsey to induce them to vote the sums asked for. The cardinal soon after experienced a second disappointment in the election of Clement VII. to fill the papal chair on the decease of Adrian; and as this was effected by the emperor's influence, Wolsey, seeing his insincerity, determined to prepare the way for a union between his master and the French king (1523).

18. The war with France was, however, continued for some time; until, Francis having been defeated and taken prisoner by the imperial army in the battle of Pavia* (1525), Henry entered into a treaty of alliance with the regent, Francis's mother, and engaged, in consideration of receiving a very large sum of money, to assist in procuring the liberation of the French monarch. This was soon afterward effected (1526); and Rome having been sacked by the brutal soldiers of the emperor, and the Pope made a captive, Henry and Francis entered into a league to restore him to liberty.

19. About this time, the king, captivated by the charms of Anne Boleyn (an bul'en), a maid of honor to the queen, began to consider in what way he could obtain a separation from his wife Catharine. Professing to have conscientious scruples with regard to the lawfulness of his marriage with his brother's widow,† he applied to Pope Clement to grant a divorce from her; and as the latter, being a prisoner, expected to receive aid from Henry, he at first rendered a somewhat favorable answer, and commissioned a legate to investigate, in connection with Wolsey, the validity of the king's marriage. After the trial had continued some months, during which the king and queen appeared before the court of the two commissioners,

† The royal couple had lived together for sixteen years; but to Henry's disappointment, their only living child was the princess Mary; and when a marriage between her and the Dauphin of France was proposed, the French ambassador expressed a doubt of the validity of her parents' marriage. it was broken off suddenly, and the case remanded to Rome, before the Pope in person, he having now recovered his liberty.

20. This greatly exasperated the king, who immediately directed his indignation against Wolsey as the cause of his disappointment. The cardinal was deprived of his office as chancellor, the great seal being bestowed upon Sir Thomas More, a man not only of eminent virtue and capacity, but greatly distinguished for his attainments in science and literature. Wolsey's splendid palace was seized by the king, and with the title of Whitehall, became afterward famous as the residence of the kings of England. The fallen minister was ordered to betake himself to his country residence near Hampton Court, and immediately found himself deserted by all those, who, during his prosperity, had paid him the most servile homage (1529).

21. He afterward retired to his see of York, where he made himself extremely popular by his hospitality, kindness to the poor, and general affability; but his relentless enemies, among whom was Anne Boleyn, were not yet satisfied, and under their influence Wolsey was arrested on a charge of high treason. While being escorted to London for trial, he was seized with severe illness, and expired shortly afterward at Leicester Abbey (1530). Among his last words was the well-known saying, "Had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs." His great faults were his arrogance and inordinate ambition and love of display; but his administration was able and generally judicious; while subsequently Henry's rule was marked by tyranny, extravagance, and passion.

22. Tired of waiting for the Pope's decision, the king, by the advice of Thomas Cranmer—a distinguished ecclesiastic, referred the question respecting his marriage with Catharine to the great universities in Europe; and these having generally decided that it was unlawful, Cranmer, who had been made archbishop of Canterbury, opened a court to examine the question. Although the queen refused to appear before it, he annulled the marriage, and ratified that with Anne Boleyn (1533), with whom the king had been privately married some time before.

23. The Pope having pronounced the judgment of Cranmer illegal, and threatened Henry with excommunication, the Parliament, under the king's influence, confirmed his marriage with Queen Anne, and formally declared him "the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England." By this declaration and other acts of Parliament, the English Church was separated entirely from the see of Rome (1534). The monasteries were afterward suppressed, and some modifications introduced into the doctrines and forms of religion. These events constituted what is called in history the "English Reformation."

24. Sir Thomas More, the virtuous and learned successor of Wolsey, unable conscientiously to support the king in these measures, had resigned the great seal, and subsequently refusing to acknowledge the king's supremacy, was condemned for treason and executed. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, suffered the same fate (1535). The king, indeed, evinced, during the whole of his subsequent reign, a spirit of the most cruel bigotry and persecution. In abandoning his allegiance to the Pope, he by no means became a convert to the new doctrines of Luther and others against the Church of Rome; and while he plundered the churches and monasteries of their possessions, he caused those who dissented from their doctrines to be burnt without the least mercy.

25. About three years after her marriage with the king, Anne Boleyn was brought to trial on a charge of being unfaithful to her royal husband; and, being found guilty, was sentenced to death, and subsequently beheaded (1536). Not satisfied with this cruel vengeance, the king caused his marriage with Anne to be annulled, and her daughter, the princess Elizabeth, to be declared illegitimate. The conduct of Henry went far to disprove the guilt of this unfortunate queen, for on the third day after her execution he married Jane Seymour, one of her maids of honor, of whom he had a short time before become greatly enamored. This queen died the next year, after giving birth to a son, who was baptized by the name of Edward (1537).

26. The suppression of the monasteries, and the other innovations introduced by the king, occasioned a serious insurrection, called the "Pilgrimage of Grace," in which many priests participated, the object being to restore the Church and suppress heresy. Hull and York were taken by the rebels, who, however, were soon dispersed by the Duke of Norfolk, and their leaders taken and executed (1536). This rebellion led to severer measures against the remaining abbeys and monasteries. All were seized, their rich possessions taken by the crown, and many of the most sacred shrines were pillaged and destroyed, including even that of St. Thomas of Canterbury, whose name, by the king's order, was erased from the calendar, his bones dug up and burned, and their ashes scattered to the winds (1538).

turned his attention to the selection of a new queen, and by the advice of his minister Cromwell, consented to marry Anne of Cleves, a Protestant princess, with whose portrait he had been highly pleased. He was, however, so greatly disappointed with the original, that he soon divorced her; but settled upon her a handsome annuity, upon which she lived in England until her death, in 1557. Cromwell, who had been instrumental in bringing about this unfortunate marriage, was charged with treason, condemned, and executed (1540).

28. The king soon afterward married Catharine Howard, niece of the Duke of Norfolk; but in less than two years she was charged with adultery, and being proved guilty, was beheaded (1542). During the same year, war again broke out with Scotland, brought on through the contrivance of the Catholic party in that country, aided by Mary of Guise (gweez), wife of the Scottish king, James V. This monarch sent a considerable force into England, but it was disastrously routed by the English at Solway Moss; and James was so deeply chagrined at the defeat, that he expired in less than a month afterward. A few days before his death, his queen gave birth to a daughter, afterward celebrated as Mary Queen of Scots (1542).

29. Henry then planned the union of the two kingdoms by effecting a marriage between his son Edward and the young Scottish queen; but this was prevented by the Catholic party, through whose influence Scotland again formed an alliance with France. Henry, therefore, entered into a league with the emperor of Germany, in order to attack France; but no results of importance followed, although the war was continued more than three years (1543-46). Meanwhile, the king, for the sixth time, entered into a matrimonial alliance, choosing Catharine Parr, widow of Lord Latimer, a lady of beauty, wit, and intelligence, and attached to the new doctrines.

30. The king, however, was exceedingly intolerant of any innovations in religion, except such as he ordered; and many suffered death for daring to express opinions at variance with his own. Among these martyrs, Anne Ascue, a young woman of singular merit and beauty, suffered death at the stake, heroically refusing to deny her faith. The queen fell into great danger by attempting a similar freedom, and only saved herself by pretending an entire submission to her royal husband's will.

31. The last victim of Henry's tyranny was the accomplished Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, who was beheaded on Tower Hill, having been unjustly condemned on a charge of treason (1547).* The king survived this event only a few days. His excesses had entirely destroyed his health, so that for some time before his death he had become loathsome to all around him, while his irascibility made him an object of constant terror. He was, without doubt, a most remorseless despot; but notwithstanding his arbitrary violation of every principle of political and religious liberty, he never lost entirely the good-will of his subjects.

32. During this reign, the first complete copy of the English Bible was printed, and ordered by the king to be placed in every parish church. It was based upon the translation of William Tyndale, and executed by Miles Coverdale. Henry VIII. encouraged learning. He founded

He had a remarkably vigorous intellect, as well as a keen and ready wit, chaste both in thought and expression, his writings breathe the most fervent regard both for virtue and religion, while they abound in those beautiful flights of fancy which are the characteristic of genuine poetry.

Trinity College in Cambridge and munificently endowed it. Wolsey founded Christ Church in Oxford, and was the first to establish in the same university a professorship for giving instruction in Greek. The most noted poets of this period were the unfortunate Surrey and Sir Thomas Wyatt.* Henry left three children—Mary, daughter of Catharine; Elizabeth, daughter of Anne Boleyn; and Edward, son of Jane Seymour. The last succeeded him.

1547 33. Edward VI. being only ten years of age, to the government was intrusted to his maternal uncle, 1553 the Duke of Somerset, as Protector; who, being in favor of promoting the cause of the Reformation, took care that those who directed the education of the youthful monarch should be of the same principles. Edward readily imbibed these views, and showed a knowledge, zeal, and devotion quite remarkable in one so young. His attention to his studies and the gentleness of his disposition also made him much loved by all around him. Cranmer and Latimer were the most eminent of his religious preceptors, as they were likewise among the most active of the Reformers; while Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, showed the greatest zeal in opposing all further religious innovations.

34. In accordance with the views of the late king, Somerset was desirous of effecting a union between England and Scotland, by the marriage of Edward with the young Scottish queen. This being opposed by the Scots, he marched a large army across the border, and gained a great victory near Edinburgh (1547), but was unable to take advantage of it, being compelled to return to England, to oppose the machinations of his enemies, among whom was his own brother, Lord Seymour. afterward, the infant queen of Scotland was sent to France, where she was educated, and subsequently became the wife of Francis II., king of that country.

35. The Duke of Somerset, finding his authority endangered by the ambitious schemes of his brother, caused him to be arrested and committed to the Tower; and a bill of attainder* being passed against him by Parliament, he was executed (1549). Further changes were made in the established religion, through the influence of the Protector; and severe laws were enacted against those who refused to comply with the liturgy, as contained in the "Book of Common Prayer," compiled chiefly by Cranmer and Ridley. Some persons who persistently refused a compliance with the new doctrines and practices, were committed to the flames.

36. The breaking up of the religious houses, the enclosure of the commons on which the peasantry had formerly pastured their cattle, the depreciation of money from the debasement of the coin by the late king, and the great influx of gold and silver from the New World, had occasioned very general distress, all of which was attributed by the people to the religious innovations. An insurrection was the consequence, the people rising in several parts of England at the same time, and demanding a restoration of the former religious institutions. These commotions were, however, soon put down; chiefly by the energetic conduct of the Earl of Warwick, who defeated the rebels with great slaughter, and caused the leaders to be hanged (1549).

37. Somerset, who up to this time had ruled England with kingly power, now became very unpopular; and, principally through the management of Warwick, was finally deposed and sent to the Tower, the latter thus obtaining the chief control of the government (1549). Somerset having made humble submission to his enemies, was released, but was a short time afterward accused of high treason, and executed on Tower Hill (1552). This was accomplished by the contrivance of Warwick, now bearing the title of Duke of Northumberland, whose unbounded ambition was able to extinguish in his mind every generous and honorable feeling.

38. The ill health of the young king prompted the duke to undertake a still bolder enterprise, which was no less than to place one of his own family on the throne. In pursuance of this scheme he married his son, Lord Guilford Dudley, to Lady Jane Grey, grand-daughter of Henry VII., and persuaded the king to set aside the claims of his sisters Mary and Elizabeth on the ground of illegitimacy, and to settle the succession upon his cousin, the Lady Jane. After this settlement was made, the king grew rapidly worse, Northumberland having dismissed his physicians and placed him in charge of persons entirely committed to his own interests. A short time after this, he expired, in the sixteenth year of his age, much lamented for his many virtues (1553).

1553 39. Mary.—The lords, being under the influence of Northumberland, immediately waited upon 1558 the Lady Jane to inform her of the death of her royal cousin, and of her own elevation to the throne by his designation; but she received the news with visible concern and anxiety. She was a lady of unusual accomplishments and singular amiability, having passed much of her time in a close application to study, and made great attainments in the Greek and Latin languages under the instruction of the distinguished scholar, Roger Ascham.* For other occupations she expressed an entire indifference, and only yielded to the persuasions of her friends to accept the throne, from the representations made to her that her title to it was clear, and that her duty dictated the step.

40. The people, however, heard the proclamation of her accession with sullen silence or expressions of scorn and contempt; and Mary at once took measures to assert her right. She was proclaimed queen by the authorities of London, and hailed with shouts of applause by the populace when she entered that city. Northumberland and his colleagues were obliged to submit, and the former with two of his accomplices was convicted of treason and executed. Lady Jane Grey and Lord Guilford were also sentenced to death, but the queen was reluctant to carry the sentence into execution. Cranmer was also tried, and convicted of participating in the treason of Northumberland, but was reserved for future punishment.

41. The cherished object of Mary was to restore the Catholic religion; and her chief counsellors in carrying out this object were Bishops Gardiner and Bonner, whom she had reinstated in their sees. The Parliament repealed all the laws of King Edward with regard to religion; and having annulled the divorce pronounced by Cranmer, declared the queen legitimate. The latter, still further to promote this measure, consented to marry Philip of Spain, son of the Emperor Charles V., who was very devoted to the Church of Rome.

42. In consequence of these changes, a rebellion broke out in Kent, under Sir Thomas Wyatt (son of the poet,

He was teacher of languages to the Lady Elizabeth, and subsequently Latin secretary to Edward VI.; and later, secretary and tutor to Queen Elizabeth. Some of the friends of Lady Jane Grey having taken part in it, the queen was finally induced to sign the death-warrant of that unfortunate princess and her husband, and they were consequently beheaded (1554). Her last message to her youthful husband (for neither of them was over seventeen years of age) was: "Our separation will be only for a moment; we shall soon meet each other in a place where our affections will be forever united, and where misfortunes will never more disturb our eternal felicity." The queen filled the Tower and other prisons with the numerous objects of her suspicion, many of them among the most distinguished of the nobility and gentry. The Princess Elizabeth was also imprisoned, but made so good a defence that she was soon released.

43. The queen had already communicated to the Roman pontiff her wish that England should be reconciled to the Catholic Church; and Cardinal Pole was directed to proceed to that country as a papal legate to direct measures necessary for its formal restoration. This was accomplished by the third Parliament of this reign (1555), the motion being carried almost by acclamation, and a memorial sent to the queen and her royal consort, regretting the nation's previous defection from the Roman see. A decree of general absolution was granted by the legate; and the laws against heresy were soon afterward revived.

44. A severe persecution of the Protestants ensued, under the direction chiefly of Bishops Gardiner and Bonner. The first to suffer death at the stake were John Rogers, one of the clergy of St. Paul's, and Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester; and these were soon followed by Saunders and Taylor, two other clergymen. this, Ridley, Bishop of London, and Latimer, of Worcester, were burnt together, both of whom showed the greatest fortitude and constancy in their sufferings, refusing to the last to recant their religious opinions (1555). Cranmer, by the promise of pardon, was induced to sign a recantation; but was nevertheless committed to the flames. At the stake, he expressed the deepest contrition for his weakness; and thrusting into the flames the hand which had signed the paper, and exclaiming, "This hand has offended," he kept it there till it was entirely consumed (1556). It has been computed that two hundred and seventy-seven persons suffered death at the stake during this persecution. The only excuse that can be offered for it is, that the age was remarkable for religious intolerance, both parties showing a like spirit in similar circumstances.

45. The queen had been for some time urged to aid her husband Philip, now king of Spain, in a war against France; but her ministers and Parliament were greatly opposed to it; Mary, though treated by her husband with great coolness and indifference, was yet very anxious to promote his views, and by various artifices at length succeeded in obtaining the means necessary to carry on the proposed war. An army, which was sent into Flanders, had considerable share in the victory gained by Philibert, Duke of Savoy, at St. Quentin* (1557). As an offset, however, to this victory, the French, under the Duke of Guise, surprised the garrison at Calais, and took the town, after it had been in the possession of the English for more than two hundred years (1558).

46. The queen, whose health had been for some time failing, was greatly dejected at this loss, and fell into a lingering fever, of which she expired a short time afterward (Nov. 17, 1558). Cardinal Pole died the same day. Mary possessed a vigorous and resolute mind; and could she have divested herself of the spirit of bigotry, so common in her age, she would have deserved a place among the most virtuous and energetic of sovereigns; but the cruelties perpetrated under her sanction have tended to obscure the many virtues and accomplishments which she undoubtedly possessed. The interests of trade were considerably promoted during her reign. A passage to Archangel* having been discovered during the previous reign, a commercial treaty was made with Russia, and the woollen and linen fabrics of England were exchanged for the skins and furs of the northern regions.

1558 47. Elizabeth, daughter of Anne Boleyn, who to succeeded Mary, had been educated in the Protestant 1603 faith, and her accession to the throne was hailed by the people with great rejoicing. She commenced her reign with great moderation, treating all with kindness and courtesy, even those by whom she had been deeply injured during the previous reign. She retained some of the council of Queen Mary, but added others who were favorable to her own views, among whom were Sir Nicholas Bacon and Sir William Cecil (ses'it), the latter being made secretary of state, and her chief adviser.

48. The first important event of her reign was the re-enactment of the laws of King Edward concerning religion, and the re-establishment of the new liturgy, to which all were required to conform under severe penalties. By the "Act of Supremacy" all clergymen and government officers were compelled to take an oath acknowledging the English sovereign head of the Church; and by the "Act of Uniformity" no persons were allowed to attend any other place of worship than those of the Established Church. Hundreds suffered death, imprisonment, or other persecution for refusing compliance with these arbitrary statutes.

49. Philip of Spain made proposals of marriage to Elizabeth; but these were declined; and she told her Parliament, who urged her to accept a consort, that she desired no higher distinction than to have engraved on her tombstone, "Here lies Elizabeth, who lived and died a maiden queen." The first eleven years of her reign was distinguished for internal quiet and prosperity. Peace was established with France and Scotland; the government, under Cecil, afterward made Lord Burleigh, was administered with energy and prudence; the debts of the crown were promptly paid off; and the nation put in a posture of defence, by the construction of a navy which gained for Elizabeth the title of "Queen of the Northern Seas."

50. There were about this time three religious parties in the kingdom: the Churchmen, or those who were attached to the Established Church; the Catholics, who, supported by the great continental powers, expected to re-establish their religion; and the Puritans, who now contended for more radical changes in religious forms and doctrines (1569). These last had imbibed their principles from those who, during the persecutions of the previous reign, had taken refuge in Geneva and Frankfort;* and they opposed Elizabeth's government, not only on the ground of religious differences, but on account of her assuming a prerogative and authority opposed to the civil

* It is computed that during the persecutions under Queen Mary as many as eight hundred Protestants sought an asylum in Switzerland and Germany. But these were of various views, and disputes arose as to the extent of the changes to be made in religious matters. After Elizabeth's accession these disputes were transferred to their own country.

and political rights of the people. It was not, however, until a subsequent reign that these fearless agitators were enabled to bring their principles into complete operation; for Elizabeth lost no opportunity of repressing their efforts, although some of her ministers favored their principles and practices.

51. England now began to distinguish herself in that splendid career of maritime enterprise which has shed such lustre upon her name. Under the auspices of Sir Walter Raleigh (raw'le), a favorite courtier of Elizabeth, voyages were made to North America, and the queen gave to the region discovered the name of Virginia (1584). Martin Frobisher also made explorations for a northwest passage to India; and Sir Francis Drake* completed a voyage around the world by way of Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope (1579).

52. The people of the Netherlands having revolted against Philip II. of Spain, in consequence of his dreadful oppressions and persecutions (1572), Elizabeth warmly espoused their cause; and Philip, therefore, made extensive preparations to invade England, with the view to conquer it and restore it to the authority of the Roman pontiff. For this purpose he equipped an immense fleet, which was styled the "Invincible Armada," consisting of 150 ships, bearing 3,000 guns and 27,000 men. But this vast armament, as it sailed up the Channel, was attacked and partly destroyed by a much smaller fleet, under the command of Lord Howard as admiral, assisted by those renowned captains, Drake, Frobisher, and Hawkins. The Spanish admiral, therefore, finding it impossible to effect a landing on the coast, or to gain any advantages over the English fleet, attempted to return to Spain by sailing round Scotland; but a storm arising, nearly all his vessels were wrecked off the Orkney Islands (1588).

* He was the first Englishman to accomplish this enterprise. As he had captured some of the Spanish treasure-ships, some persons, fearing the hostility of Spain, endeavored to persuade the queen to disavow the enterprise and punish Drake; but she, in admiration of his valor, conferred on him the honor of knighthood, and participated in a banquet given on board of his ship at Deptford.

53. The year preceding this glorious event is memorable for the execution of the unfortunate Mary, Queen of Scots, at Fotheringay Castle,* after an imprisonment of more than eighteen years. Mary, as has already been related, was sent to France, and became the wife of Francis II. She had been educated in the Catholic faith, and had imbibed a strong partiality for the doctrines and practices of that form of religion. The early death of her husband compelled her to return to Scotland (1561), where she assumed the throne, although she was much disliked by the Scots on account of her religion and gay manners.

54. The Scottish reformers were at this time in the ascendant, under the guidance of the celebrated John Knox, and had made even greater havoc of the religious establishments in that country than had occurred in England. From this zealot and his associates, the young queen received every possible indignity, the Protestant preachers taking pride in insulting and vilifying her to her face, although they were treated by her with the most gracious condescension and respect, and although she had issued a proclamation enjoining all to submit to the established religion.†

55. A few years after her return to Scotland (1565), she married her cousin, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley; but she lived very unhappily with him, on account of his misconduct, extravagance, and vicious excesses. Becoming jealous of her secretary—one Rizzio (reet'se-o), an Italian—Darnley, accompanied by several of his friends, rushed one evening into her apartment, where she was engaged with her secretary and others; and the unfortunate favorite was seized and hurried into the antechamber, where he was despatched with fifty-six wounds (1566). Mary, though at first horror-stricken at this crime, and indignant at the insult offered to herself, afterward professed to pardon it, and extorted from her weak and wicked husband the confession that a plot had been formed by himself and others against her. Some time after this, Darnley was attacked by illness, during which his house, a lonely, half-ruined mansion in Edinburgh, where he had been placed by the queen, was blown up by gunpowder, and he was thus killed.

56. The suspicion that Mary was accessory to this crime seemed afterward to be confirmed by her marriage with the Earl of Bothwell, a reckless and dissolute nobleman, who was generally believed to have been concerned in its perpetration. This led to a confederation of the nobles, who, having taken the queen prisoner, compelled her to abdicate the throne in favor of her infant son James, and confined her in Lochlev'en Castle.* She, however, escaped thence, and raised a small army, which was defeated by the regent, Murray; whereupon Mary fled into England, and threw herself upon the protection of Elizabeth; but instead of the generous hospitality which she had anticipated, she found herself a captive for life (1568).

57. Mary had given great offence to Elizabeth, when in France, by assuming the title of Queen of England, on the ground that the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne Boleyn was unlawful, and hence that her daughter, being illegitimate, had no right to the throne. During Mary's life, the Catholic party in England favored these pretensions; and many conspiracies were formed by them to place her upon the throne. In the last of these, the object of which was to take the life of Elizabeth, Mary, notwithstanding her repeated avowals of innocence, was pronounced guilty of being an accomplice, and sentenced to death (1586). The Parliament urged her execution; but the queen appeared very reluctant to give her assent, and the French and Scotch ambassadors interceded earnestly in behalf of the unfortunate Mary. Elizabeth at last signed the death-warrant, and Mary was beheaded at Fotheringay (1587).

58. Queen Mary was one of the most beautiful and accomplished princesses of her age. Her manners were graceful and winning, and her conversation full of wit and sprightly intelligence. She was a charming singer, and could accompany herself on several instruments; and the poems which she has left attest a genius for that kind of composition. Her imprudence and want of self-control, and, it is to be feared, the absence of strong moral principles, brought upon her those great calamities which have shed a mournful interest upon her name. The signing of her death-warrant is, however, considered by some the greatest blot upon the fame of the virgin queen.

59. Elizabeth not only contended with Philip of Spain upon the ocean, but sent a force of auxiliary troops to Holland, under the Earl of Leicester, a nobleman for whom she appears to have entertained a singular esteem and affection. He was, however, quite unsuccessful, possessing neither the courage nor capacity requisite for the duty assigned him. In an attack upon Zutphen,* he entirely failed, and the gallant and accomplished Sir Philip Sydney was mortally wounded in the battle (1568). Leicester, whose death occurred soon afterward (1588), was succeeded in the queen's affections by his stepson, Robert, Earl of Essex, a young man of handsome exterior and considerable merit, but of a daring and reckless disposition.

60. During the religious wars in France, Elizabeth gave all the aid in her power to the cause of the Protestants; and when Henry IV. ascended the throne (1589), she sent him money, and force under Essex, to assist him in subduing his enemies. She was, however, much displeased at his abjuring the Protestant religion, and wrote him a letter reproaching him in angry terms for his apostasy; but from interested motives she still continued to assist him with supplies of men and money.

61. An insurrection having broken out in Ireland, Essex was sent with a large army to subdue it; but having failed disgracefully in this expedition, and returned to England without the consent of the queen, he was arrested by her orders, and deprived by the council of all his public offices. He, however, expected a free pardon from the queen, but not receiving it, attempted to raise an insurrection against her government. In this mad scheme he met with no success, but, with his accomplices, was seized and thrown into the Tower. Being arraigned for treason, he was found guilty; and the queen, though with great reluctance, having signed his death-warrant, he was beheaded (1601).

62. Elizabeth survived this event but a short time. The fate of this young nobleman, for whom she appears to have had a very deep affection, oppressed her mind with a settled melancholy.* For ten days previous to her death, she lay upon the floor, supported by cushions, and gave way to her feelings of distress by sighs and groans. She seldom spoke, and persistently refused nourishment. Being solicited to nominate a successor, she replied that she would have a king to succeed her, referring to James of Scotland. In reply to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who advised her to fix her thoughts upon God, she said that her mind did not in the least wander from Him. She soon after fell into a lethargy, and without a struggle expired (March 24th, 1603), in the forty-fifth year of her reign and the seventieth of her age.

63. Elizabeth was endowed with remarkable talents for government, and commanded the respect not only of her own subjects but of foreign states. She was, however, more mindful of the present prosperity and happiness of her people than of permanently establishing their liberty. She was haughty and despotic, especially in the latter part of her reign; and though in her religious principles and practices she appears to have inclined toward Catholicism, she persecuted Catholics and Puritans with equal severity. Her private character was somewhat marked by insincerity and cruelty, and was too much wanting in the softer virtues of her sex to be highly commendable; while her personal vanity and petty jealousy of female competitors has subjected her to considerable ridicule and contempt.

64. During this illustrious reign, flourished the poet Spenser, who wrote the "Faerie Queene;" the immortal poet and dramatist, Shakspeare, whose works are the especial glory of English literature; and Lord Bacon,

* It is said that the Countess of Nottingham, who died about this time, had confessed that Essex had committed to her care a ring to be delivered to the queen, and that from enmity to him she had withheld it. This ring had been given to Essex by the queen with the promise that whenever he should send it to her, it should not fail to remind her of their friendship, and awaken her tender regard for him. The queen, it is said, shook the dying Countess, exclaiming, "God may forgive you, but I never can."

who commenced his splendid career as a philosopher, though he disgraced himself by his virulence in the prosecution of the unfortunate Essex, from whom he had received many favors and benefits. Sir Philip Sydney was also a prominent character in the literary world, being the author of a sort of pastoral romance styled "Arcadia," very much admired at that time. Ben Jonson, the dramatist and poet, was also one of the noted characters of Elizabeth's reign.

STATE OF SOCIETY UNDER THE TUDORS.

65. The proceedings of Parliament during this period show that the principles of civil and political freedom made but little progress. The Tudors were in general very vigorous princes, and ruled with a high hand. In all things, except in the voting of supplies of money to the sovereign, the parliaments showed a remarkable spirit of submission to his will; and many practices were acquiesced in which violated the most sacred of the subjects' liberties. Of this character were the proceedings in the Court of Star Chamber, established or revived in the reign of Henry VII., and the Court of High Commission, instituted by Queen Elizabeth. Both were instruments of the most flagrant oppression, one for punishing political offences, the other to compel religious conformity.

66. The great change which, during this period, occurred in religious matters, had for a time the effect to increase the influence of the monarch. Unlimited supremacy was conferred by Parliament; and during the reign of Elizabeth, the utterance of seditious words against the queen was made a capital offence. A Puritan who had written a book against the government of bishops was, during the same reign, condemned to death; and another was executed on the charge of denying the "absolute power of the queen." No justice could be obtained by any one in opposition to the will of the court or its officers. If a poor man sued a nobleman or member of the privy council for his just debt, he was liable to be thrust into prison, from which he could obtain release only by the relinquishment of a large part of his property.

67. The revenue of Queen Elizabeth has been estimated at half a million sterling. She caused the customs to be more carefully collected; and in 1590 they amounted to fifty thousand pounds a year, having been raised to that sum from fourteen thousand. The supplies obtained from Parliament during her whole reign are said to have only amounted to three millions, so that she must have exercised very great economy to carry on such vast undertakings with so slender a revenue. Loans had been formerly very often obtained from the Dutch, particularly from the city of Antwerp, the per cent. paid being as high as ten or twelve; but Elizabeth established so good a credit in her capital that the merchants of that city granted her loans, and rendered it unnecessary to have recourse to foreigners.

68. Commerce and Navigation made immense progress during the sixteenth century. The voyage of Columbus had given a vast impulse to maritime adventure, which was still further stimulated by the rich traffic to which it gave rise. Magellan's discovery of a southwest passage to the East, led to many attempts during this period to discover one in the northwest. Martin Frobisher made three fruitless voyages with this object; and Davis, not discouraged by his failure, made another attempt, in which he discovered the strait that bears his name. The discovery of a passage to Archangel, which was made during the reign of Queen Mary, brought England into close communication with Russia; but active commerce with that country did not begin until 1569. Elizabeth obtained from the Czar a patent by which the English were to have the whole trade of the empire.

69. Encouraged by privileges so extensive, the English ventured further into that extensive region than any Europeans had previously done. They transported their goods a long distance up the Dwina in boats made of the trunks of trees, and then conveying their commodities overland to the Volga, carried them down that river to Astrachan, whence they shipped them across the Caspian Sea, and distributed them through Persia and other eastern countries. Trade was also for the first time carried on with Turkey (1583). These successes were the occasion of great jealousy on the part of the Hanse Towns, who obtained an edict from the German emperor prohibiting the English from carrying on trade in any part of the empire. Elizabeth, in retaliation, seized and confiscated sixty of their ships which had been seized in the river Tagus with contraband goods of the Spaniards.

70. The naval power of England commenced in the reign of Henry VII.; but ship-building was evidently not active, since his successor was obliged to hire vessels from Hamburg, Lubec, Genoa, Venice, and other great commercial towns. Under the vigorous sway of the Virgin Queen, a better state of things was introduced; and in 1582, the number of seamen in England was registered at over fourteen thousand; and the number of vessels amounted to above twelve hundred. The navy, at her death, was considered large; but the whole number of guns was less than eight hundred. The military force of the nation at the time of the threatened attack by the Spanish Armada was set down at about 200,000 men able to bear arms.

71. Manufacturing industry, at the commencement of Elizabeth's reign, had made but little progress, foreign wares of all kinds enjoying the preference over those made at home. The persecutions in France and the Netherlands, however, drove a large number of skilled artisans into England, who laid the foundation of the manufacturing prosperity afterward attained. It is said that Queen Elizabeth was presented, in the third year of her reign, with a pair of silk stockings, with which she was so much pleased that she never wore cloth hose afterward. The cloth manufacture was so extensive, that as many as 200,000 pieces were said to be exported annually from England. The making of pins commenced during Elizabeth's reign. Before that time the ladies used to fasten their dresses with clasps, small skewers of gold, silver, or brass, or hooks and eyes.

72. Agriculture was carried on with more success, although vast tracts of land were still devoted to the pasturage of sheep. The introduction of clover, hops, and various vegetables, together with apricots, currants, gooseberries, cherries, and other fruits, changed somewhat the character of horticulture. Pleasure gardens were laid out with more taste, and were ornamented with terraces, grottoes, statuary, fountains, etc. The condition of the peasantry was considerably improved. Their wattled huts gave place by degrees to comfortable houses, built of stone or brick; and glass windows came into general use. Wheaten bread was eaten more generally, although rye and barley constituted the principal food of the poorer classes. Potatoes were introduced from South America by Raleigh, who also brought tobacco from the West Indies, and set the example of using it in England.

71. Manufactures? Cloth manufacture? Pins?

72. Agriculture? Horticulture? Pleasure gardens? Condition of the peasantry? Wheaten bread? Potatoes? Tobacco?

73. The nobility still supported, to some extent, their ancient magnificence in hospitality, and in the number of their servants and retainers. The Earl of Leicester gave the queen an entertainment at his famous castle at Kenilworth, in which the most astonishing profusion was displayed. Among other particulars, it is said that as many as three hundred and sixty-five hogsheads of beer were consumed at it. Lord Burleigh is said to have kept a hundred servants; and his silver plate, it is remarked by a writer of the period, "amounted to only fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds in weight." Great luxury in apparel was also indulged in, the queen taking the lead; who, though she issued a proclamation to restrain this species of extravagance, at her death left a wardrobe of 3,000 dresses.

74. The revival of learning, particularly the study of the classics, constituted a remarkable feature of this period. Erasmus, a native of Holland, was professor of Greek in the university of Oxford, and did much toward the attainment of this result. Henry VIII., Mary, Elizabeth, and Lady Jane Grey were all distinguished for their classical learning.* Roger Ascham has already been referred to as a distinguished teacher of Latin and Greek. Middle English now gave place to the New or Modern English, which, with slight modifications, continues to be the language used. This was the language of Shakspeare and

* As likewise was Mary, Queen of Scots, who had acquired a facility in the use of several languages. The Latin prayer which she composed a short time before her melancholy and tragic end has been much admired. Although in the mediæval style, the language is expressive and elegant:—

O Domine Deus, speravi in te!
O Care mi Jesu, nunc libera me!
In dura catenâ, in misera poenâ desidero te!
Languendo, gemendo, et genuflectendo,
Adoro, imploro, ut liberes me!

It has been thus rendered into English, following as closely the Latin as the English idiom permits:

My hopes, O Lord, have been in thee!
O Jesus!—Saviour! set me free!
In anguish and pain—in this iron chain—I call on thee!
With many a groan, and bitter moan—and kneeling on this prison stone,
I adore thee—implore thee,—to set me free!

SECTION II.

THE STUART FAMILY.

Extending from the Accession of James I. (1603) to that of George I. (1714).

1603 1. James I.—The Scottish king succeeded without any opposition to the throne left vacant by the 1625 death of Elizabeth. He was thirty-six years of age, had received a good education under the celebrated George Buchanan, but was very vain of his learning, and took every opportunity to make a display of it. With little judgment and good sense, and totally deficient in refinement of manners, he was constantly an object of ridicule or contempt. He had also unfortunately imbibed the notion that a king was divinely vested with absolute power; and hence his conduct was often tyrannical in the extreme, being utterly at variance with those principles of liberty which the English people had long viewed as their most valuable birthright.

2. Scarcely had James commenced to reign, when a plot was formed to depose him, and place his cousin, Arabella Stuart, on the throne. The leaders of the conspiracy—among whom were Lord Cobham, Lord Grey (a Puritan), and others—were tried and convicted, and some were executed. Sir Walter Raleigh was also charged with being concerned in the plot; and the jury, influenced by the bitter invectives of Sir Edward Coke, the attorney-general, found him guilty, though it was generally admitted that the proof was insufficient to convict him. He was afterward reprieved by the king, though still kept a prisoner; and Cobham and Grey were pardoned after they had laid their heads upon the block (1603).

1. What was the age of James I. when he ascended the throne? His character? What made him tyrannical?

3. Soon after this, a plot was arranged by the Catholic party, disappointed in not receiving the religious privileges which they had expected on the accession of James. The object of it was to overturn the government by the destruction of the king and both houses of parliament. For this purpose a vault beneath the House of Lords was hired, and thirty-six barrels of gunpowder were stored therein, which, on the opening of Parliament, were to be fired by one Guy Fawkes, an officer in the Spanish service, brought to England to perpetrate this act. This conspiracy, styled the "Gunpowder Plot," was discovered just on the eve of its execution; and Guy Fawkes, with some of his fellow-conspirators, was executed (1605).

4. During the previous reign, unsuccessful attempts had been made by Raleigh to plant a colony in the region to which the queen had given the name of Virginia. King James, in the first part of his reign, granted charters to two companies—the London, or South Virginia Company, and the Plymouth, or North Virginia Company. Under the former of these, the first permanent settlement was made at Jamestown (1607); and under its first governor, Lord Delaware, it attained a condition of considerable prosperity. By an arbitrary act of the king, the company was afterward dissolved, and Virginia made a royal province (1624). The East India Company, established by Queen Elizabeth (1600), was rechartered by James for an unlimited period (1609); and a short time afterward the first English factory was established at Surat (1612).

3. What other plot was formed? What means were adopted to carry it out? How was it discovered?

4. What attempts at colonization were made? What companies were organized? What settlement was effected? Its condition under Delaware? How did Virginia become a royal province? What other important events occurred?

5. During this period Sir Walter Raleigh, who had originated these enterprises, was enduring the miseries of a hopeless imprisonment, the long and tedious hours of which he had relieved by the composition of his great work, the "History of the World." Being released in order that he might point out a gold-mine which he asserted to exist in Guiana (ghe-ah'nah), and having failed in the expedition, he was, on his return, beheaded, in pursuance of the sentence previously pronounced against him (1618). This act reflects a lasting disgrace upon James, who sacrificed this illustrious man to appease the anger of Spain, incensed by the attack which Raleigh had made upon some of the Spanish settlements in South America.

6. One of the worst characteristics of this monarch was his proneness to attach himself to unworthy favorites, the first of whom was Robert Carr, a young Scotchman, on whom James for several years lavished the most profuse favors, finally bestowing upon him the title of the Earl of Somerset (1612). His fall occurred a short time afterward; for being concerned, with his wife, previously Countess of Essex, in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury in the Tower, the guilty pair were tried and convicted, but were pardoned by the king, and afterward lived in total obscurity. James had previously transferred his favors to a young man named George Villiers (vil'yerez), of good family, engaging manners, and finé personal appearance (1615). The infatuation of the monarch in regard to this new minion was unbounded; and in the course of a few years he was created Viscount Villiers, subsequently earl and marquis, and finally Duke of Buckingham. He soon gained an infamous notoriety by his arrogance and profligacy.

5. What led to the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh? Why does it reflect disgrace upon James?

6. What is said of Robert Carr? What led to his fall? What is said of George Villiers?

7. James, although of a pusillanimous disposition, was very persistent in upholding the royal prerogative. His arbitrary acts and principles, however, met with decided opposition from the Parliament of 1621, who declared their privileges to be the ancient and undoubted birthright of the English people; which bold declaration so incensed the king, that he sent for the journals of the Commons, and tore the record out with his own hands. The same parliament impeached the celebrated Lord Bacon, Viscount St. Albans and Chancellor. His prodigality and fondness for ostentation and luxury had plunged him into great expenses, to defray which he had taken bribes from suitors in his court. He confessed his guilt, and was sentenced to pay a fine of £40,000, to dismissal from all his offices, and imprisonment in the Tower. In consideration of his many merits, the king released him from prison, and remitted the fine. He survived his disgrace five years, during which he prosecuted those studies in philosophy and science from which he obtained so splendid and enduring a fame.

8. James, who by his reckless extravagance was always in want of money, was anxious to bring about a marriage between his son Charles and the Infanta of Spain, expecting that a large dowry would be paid with her. To this the nation was much opposed, on account of the religion of the princess; but it was favored by the Duke of Buckingham. The latter conceived the romantic project of a journey to Spain by Prince Charles and himself in disguise, so that the former might pay his addresses in person to the princess. To this the king reluctantly consented, fearing for the safety of the Prince of Wales, whom he used to call "Baby Charles." On their way they visited the French court, where Charles first saw the French princess Henrietta Maria, whom he subsequently married.

9. The King of Spain treated his visitors with great respect; but the levity, insolence, and extravagant behavior of Buckingham disgusted everybody at the Spanish court, so that, finding himself an object of great dislike, he determined to prevent the match, and, on returning to England, it was publicly renounced, greatly to the joy of the people. Buckingham, to clear himself from censure, made a false statement to Parliament, accusing the Spanish court of insincerity; and to this the young prince, equally untruthful, gave his assent.

10. A treaty was soon afterward made with France, one of the terms of which was the marriage of Charles to Henrietta Maria. Before it was completed, however, the king was suddenly seized with illness, and expired, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of twenty-two years (1625). One of the most important events of this period was a new translation of the Bible. It was executed under the patronage of the king, and by a number of learned men designated by him. It was published in 1611; and having superseded other versions, continues to be the English Bible in general use among Protestants.

11. The Puritans—so called from their strict principles and austerity of life—greatly increased in numbers and influence during this reign. Their public preachings were directed against the dissoluteness, levity, and luxury of the times, and particularly inculcated a more serious observance of the Sabbath, which had previously been a day of pleasure and pastime. Some of them, disgusted with the king's high-handed measures, especially against those who refused to conform to the established church, emigrated to Holland, and afterward to New England, where they made a settlement at Plymouth (1620).

1625 12. Charles I.—The second son of James succeeded him, his eldest son Henry* having died some 1649 years previously. Shortly after his accession, Charles completed his marriage with Henrietta Maria, whom he had previously espoused by proxy in France, and who was escorted to England by the Duke of Buckingham. The conduct of Charles toward the Infanta had greatly incensed the Spanish monarch, and war had been declared. To prosecute this war, the king summoned a Parliament, and asked for a vote of supplies. This the Commons, who were determined to assert their privileges, under the leadership of many distinguished men, among whom were Sir Edward Coke, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir John Eliot, refused to grant, unless Charles would relinquish some of the prerogatives which had been exercised by his father, and which he still claimed as his hereditary right. Charles, therefore, dissolved the Parliament, and proceeded to levy money by his own authority.

13. These forced loans, called tonnage and poundage† and ship-money,‡ gave great offence to the people, whose discontent was still further increased by the conduct of Buckingham, through whose influence a war was undertaken against France, and an expedition sent to Rochelle (ro-shel') to aid the Huguenots, then assailed by Richelieu (reesh'e-lu). Buckingham himself assumed the command, but managed the affair so badly that nothing was accomplished; and in a few months he returned to England,

* It was for this young prince that Raleigh composed his "History of the World." He was amiable, intelligent, and well-disposed; and his death was greatly lamented.

† Tonnage and poundage were duties on imported merchandise which it had been customary to allow the king to levy since the reign of Edward III. The Parliament of 1625 refused, however, to grant this privilege to the king for a longer period than one year.

‡ Ship-money was an arbitrary tax levied on the seaports for the equipment of a fleet. Charles extended it over the whole kingdom.

having lost the greater part of his forces, and was universally reprobated for his rashness and folly (1627).

14. In a Parliament called a few months afterward Charles met with more determined opposition, although many of the former members had been made to suffer for their boldness by imprisonment and other oppressive measures of the court. Charles attempted intimidation, but the spirit of liberty was not to be thus crushed. In a bill called the *Petition of Right the Commons emphatically asserted the privileges which had been conferred upon them by Magna Charta and other ancient statutes; and to this bill the king was forced to give his assent (1628).

15. Soon after this, one cause of popular discontent was removed by the assassination of the Duke of Buckingham at Portsmouth, whither he had gone to superintend the preparations for a second expedition against France. The murderer, one Felton, who had served under the duke as lieutenant, but had failed in his application for promotion, was immediately apprehended, and soon afterward executed. The command of the French expedition was conferred on the Earl of Lindsey; but it reached Rochelle too late to afford any assistance to the Huguenots, who were obliged to surrender the town in sight of the English admiral (1628).

16. Another session of Parliament having taken place (1629), and the members† still proving refractory, the king dissolved it, and determined to rule without a Parliament, continuing the illegal exactions which had already made

* The Petition of Right was an emphatic statement of the privileges of the people as conferred by previous enactments. It is regarded as the second great charter of English liberty.

† Among these was Oliver Cromwell, who, on this his first appearance in Parliament, attracted considerable notice by the plainness of his dress, his clownish manners, and his intense zeal in favor of the Puritans. He was the son of Robert Cromwell, and was born at Huntingdon, April 25th, 1599. At the age of seventeen he was sent to the University of Cambridge, but remained there only a short time. He afterward settled at Huntingdon, and carried on the business of a brewer; but on receiving a handsome legacy he abandoned it.

him so unpopular. He also, principally by means of the Star Chamber,* attempted to punish such of the members of Parliament as had made themselves particularly obnoxious to him. Some of them were fined for what was called their seditious language and behavior, and refusing to pay the fines, were imprisoned. The death of Sir John Eliot in prison greatly increased the popular indignation, all regarding him as a martyr to the cause of English liberty.

17. Charles, however, adopted the policy of choosing some of his ministers from among the popular leaders, one of whom, Sir Thomas Wentworth, was created Earl of Strafford, and soon became the principal minister of the king. All who accepted any of these royal favors were viewed as traitors by the popular party, and pursued with the bitterest hatred, more especially by the Puritan leaders, toward whom Charles, under the influence of his queen, pursued a course of studied hostility. He renewed the edict of his father allowing sports and recreations on Sunday, and ordered the proclamation to be read by the clergy after divine service, punishing all such as refused obedience. This was a cause of great scandal to the austere Puritans, who were very rigid in the observance of the Sabbath, and preached against the popular pastimes—plays, dancing, May-festivals, etc.—common at this time.

18. Under the influence of Archbishop Laud, the liturgy was altered, and the ritual increased by the addition of many of the ceremonial observances of the Church of Rome; and this was also a cause of great displeasure to the

* The Court of Star Chamber was of very ancient origin, and derived its name from the chamber of the king's palace at Westminster in which it used to hold its sessions, the ceiling of this apartment being decorated with stars. It had very extensive powers, both civil and criminal, and could adjudge cases without the intervention of a jury. Hence it became a formidable instrument of tyranny. It was abolished by act of Parliament in 1641.

Puritans as well as to the Protestants in general. Many of the former, chiefly of the sect styled Independents, to avoid a conformity with the established church, which the laws required, emigrated to New England, and founded Massachusetts, and other colonies in that country. Charles also attempted to impose this liturgy upon the Scottish people; but on the first attempt to read it in Edinburgh, a tumult arose among the people, during which the Bishop had a stool thrown at him, and on leaving the church narrowly escaped from the enraged populace (1637).

19. The king insisting upon obedience, and issuing a proclamation to enforce it, an insurrection ensued; and the famous Covenant was formed and signed, according to which the Scottish people bound themselves to unite for their mutual defence, and to resist all religious innovations (1638). With his accustomed weakness and insincerity, Charles first attempted partial concessions; but these proving ineffectual, war ensued, Richelieu, who was then at the head of the French government, fomenting the animosities of the Scots, in revenge for the previous interference of Charles in the affairs of France.

20. The advantages were on the side of the Covenanters; and Charles, to obtain supplies, was obliged to have recourse to that Parliament which he had failed to summon during more than eleven years. The same spirit of opposition being manifested, he dissolved it after a session of three weeks (May, 1640); and having resorted to the same illegal expedients as before to raise money, he marched with a considerable army against the Covenanters. The latter invaded England, and after defeating a detachment of the royal forces at the Tyne River, took possession of Newcastle.

21. This compelled the king to call a new Parliament; but the elections resulted in favor of the popular party; and on the assembling of this body (Nov. 3d, 1640), memorable as the "Long Parliament," Charles found his authority confronted with the same spirit of sturdy independence and opposition, which he had so often experienced. The first act of the Commons was to impeach the Earl of Strafford, so odious to them on account of his desertion of their cause, and as the ready instrument of the king's most obnoxious measures. Archbishop Laud was also impeached, and both were taken into custody to await their trial.

22. That of Strafford lasted thirteen days; and such were the eloquence and ability which he displayed in his defence, that his enemies, despairing of his conviction by the House of Lords, abandoned the impeachment, and resorted to the expedient of a Bill of Attainder.* This they carried through the House of Commons with but few dissenting voices, and the popular excitement was so great that the Peers also were induced to pass it, but by a small vote (May 7th, 1641). The king at first refused to give his assent; but the loud clamors and measures of the populace made him irresolute, and after the Earl had written to him generously requesting that he would not allow his personal regard for him to weigh against the wishes of his subjects, and stating that he was willing to be a sacrifice for the removal of the present troubles, Charles weakly and ungratefully assented to the bill.

23. When informed of the royal assent, Strafford started up, and exclaimed, in the words of Scripture, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men!" In three days he was brought to the block, passing to which he stopped under the window of Laud's prison to receive his blessing. The prelate raised his hand to pronounce it; but grief choked his utterance, and he fell senseless on the floor. Strafford acted on the scaffold with great dignity and composure. His execution took place in the presence of a vast multitude, who subsequently expressed their joy by illuminations and bonfires (May 12th, 1641). Although convicted by a most arbitrary and unjust measure, he was without doubt an enemy to his country's liberty; but Charles, who most cowardly deserted his friend, was afterward convinced of the weakness of his conduct, and deeply repented of it.

* By a Bill of Attainder, a person is pronounced guilty by act of Parliament, which is passed as other laws with the consent of King, Lords, and Commons. In an impeachment the Commons are only the accusers, and the Peers are the judges. Such bills were frequently resorted to in the reign of Henry VIII., to convict persons who could not have been proved guilty by the ordinary process of the courts. The following is the entry on the Journals in regard to Strafford's case: "April 19th, 1641. Resolved upon question, that the endeavor of Thomas, Earl of Strafford, to subvert the ancient fundamental laws of the realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary tyrannical government against law, is high treason."

24. Meanwhile, Parliament continued its vigorous measures for protection and reform. A bill was passed that it should not be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved without its own consent; the Star Chamber was abolished, and the jurisdiction of the king's council abridged. These proceedings, together with the success of the Covenanters in Scotland, excited a spirit of opposition in Ireland against the English Parliament; which, through its intense hostility to the Roman Catholic worship, was in that country an object of fear and suspicion. Commissioners were sent to the king to demand religious toleration; and Charles, feeling it to be for his interest to conciliate them, gave them a favorable reception. The Irish, however, rose in insurrection; and the English settlers were massacred by thousands with every circumstance of barbarity. The ancient English planters, called the "English of the Pale," also joined with the natives in this dreadful revolt and massacre.

25. The Commons accused Charles of encouraging this rebellion, and, therefore, instead of voting supplies to the king, they levied money, and took arms from the magazines; ostensibly for its suppression, but secretly kept them as a reserve for future opposition to the royal authority. To vindicate their open mistrust of the king, they adopted and published a "Remonstrance" to the people against the various measures of his reign, artfully fanning, in every way, the popular feeling against him, as well as against the established church, the bishops, and others connected with what was styled prelacy. Multitudes flocked to Westminster, insulted the lords and bishops, and insolently threatened the king himself. Those who favored the royal cause were styled "Cavaliers;" while these bestowed on the rabble who clamored against the king, the appellation of "Roundheads," in derision of their cropped hair.

26. The bishops, being prevented from attending Parliament, protested against the illegality of its acts; and on this account they were impeached by the Commons and committed to custody. A few days afterward, the king was betrayed into taking a step which injured him greatly in the opinion of the well-disposed part of his subjects, and promoted the objects of his enemies. This was the impeachment of Lord Kimbolton and five distinguished members of the House of Commons, including Hampden* and Pym,† charging them with conspiring to alienate from him the affections of his subjects, to subvert the rights of the Parliament, to excite the disobedience of the army, and to extort the consent of the majority in Parlia-

* John Hampden had been very prominent in opposing the illegal exactions of the government. In 1627, he was imprisoned for refusing to pay his proportion of the loan levied by the king's sole authority; and in 1636, he resolutely refused to pay any of the ship-money, and was prosecuted and convicted by the government. His opposition to Charles in Parliament, had been very open and decided.

† John Pym was one of the most conspicuous and talented of the Parliamentary leaders. During the latter part of the reign of James I., he became noted for his vigorous opposition to the arbitrary measures of the Court; and in the succeeding reign, until his death in 1643, evinced the same earnest regard for his country's liberty. His fearless spirit, fervid eloquence, and thorough knowledge of Parliamentary business gave him so great an influence, that he received from his party the title of "King Pym."

ment by the aid of mobs. A sergeant-at-arms afterward demanded from the House the surrender of the five members, but could obtain no answer to the demand; and royal messengers were despatched to seize them.

27. To add to the difficulty, the king came himself to the House attended by an armed retinue, and demanded that the obnoxious members should be pointed out. But the Speaker, Lent'hall, refused to comply, boldly declaring that he was the servant of the House, and could act only in accordance with its directions. The king, therefore, retired without effecting his purpose. amid the low murmurs of "Privilege! privilege!" from the indignant members. This arbitrary act excited universal opposition; and the citizens of London were the whole night in arms, determined to protect at all hazards the five members from arrest. Hampden, who had made a bold stand five years before against the payment of ship-money, was particularly dear to the people; and four thousand horsemen went to London to testify their devotion to him (1642).

28. The king, obliged to abandon his prosecution of the members, formally pardoned them, and offered an apology to the House for the breach of privilege which he had committed. The latter, aware that it could only preserve its newly-acquired power by the sword, made preparations for the impending struggle. The magazine at Hull was seized by one of its adherents, the command of the Tower was bestowed on another, and a bill was passed giving the control of the militia entirely to the Commons. But Charles, finding himself supported by a considerable party, refused his assent to the bill, and issued a proclamation against the attempted usurpation.

29. This brought matters to an issue. The king and his counsellors determined to resist the demands of Parliament, which amounted to no less than the annihilation of the royal authority; and collecting what forces he could, Charles erected his standard at Nottingham—the signal of civil war throughout the kingdom (August 22, 1642). The royalists, or cavaliers, included the greater part of the nobility, clergy, and landed gentry, with all who were attached to the established church, and also the Catholics. The Roundheads, or supporters of Parliament, were chiefly composed of the yeomanry of the country, the townspeople, and the dissenters or Puritans. Of the latter, the sect called Independents were particularly hostile to the monarchy as well as to the established church.

30. The Parliamentary forces were at first led by the Earl of Essex, son of Elizabeth's favorite, and a general of considerable skill and experience. The command of the royal army was intrusted to the Earl of Lindsey; the cavalry was commanded by the king's nephew, the famous Prince Rupert;* and it was the latter who commenced the war, by routing a body of the parliamentary cavalry at Worcester. The first general engagement took place at Edgehill, and Lindsey was mortally wounded and taken prisoner, but there was no decided victory on either side (1642). In a skirmish the next year, the illustrious Hampden was mortally wounded, and his loss was felt as a severe blow to the popular party.

31. During this year (1643), the Royalists, under Prince Rupert, gained some advantages in the west; and a general engagement took place at Newbury, but with no decided result. The Royalists lost one of their chief supporters in the brave and eloquent Lord Falkland (fawk'land), who, while he had at first firmly and patriotically opposed the unjust pretensions of the king, stood by him when the attempt was made to deprive him of his legal authority. He held, at his death, the office of Secretary of State, and in that position had won a high reputation for the able papers in which he advocated the royal cause.

32. The Parliament entered into negotiations with Scotland to bring about a combination of their forces against the king; and, principally through the skill and address of Sir Henry Vane, who had been sent as a commissioner to Edinburgh, a "solemn league and covenant" was entered into, by which the Scottish people renewed the pledges of the previous covenant, and bound themselves to assist the cause of the English Parliament. A large army of Scots was accordingly sent into England; but this was counter-balanced by a considerable force which the king succeeded in obtaining from Ireland (1643).

33. Lord Fairfax, who commanded the Parliamentary forces in the north, formed a junction with the Scotch, under Leslie, Earl of Leven, and laid siege to York; but the arrival of Prince Rupert with a considerable army raised the siege, and led to the battle of Marston Moor, in which the Royalists, under the Marquis of Newcastle, sustained a severe defeat, principally through the skill and activity of Oliver Cromwell, by whom Prince Rupert's cavalry was routed and his artillery captured (July 2, 1644). The prince had insisted on giving battle to the Parliamentary army contrary to the advice and wishes of Newcastle; and, after the disastrous result, that nobleman abandoned the royal cause and left the kingdom. His courage, talents, and nobleness of character made him the ornament of the court and of his order; and consequently his loss was a severe blow to the king. In the south, the Royalists met with some successes over the Parliamentary forces under Essex and Sir William Waller; but another army, under the Earl of Manchester, defeated Charles in the second battle of Newbury, and compelled him to retreat to Oxford (Oct. 27, 1644).

34. For some time previous to this, the sect denominated Independents had been growing in influence. They held that every congregation formed a church by itself, and was independent of all general assemblies or synods, having the right to elect its own pastor and make all needful rules for its own government. They were often called the "Root-and-branch men," since they advocated the entire abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of a republic. To these belonged Oliver Cromwell and Sir Henry Vane, and through their influence a bill, styled the "Self-denying Ordinance,"* was passed by Parliament, which forbade any of its members from holding command in the army.

35. Essex, Manchester, Waller, and others, therefore resigned their commissions; and Sir Thomas Fairfax † was appointed commander-in-chief. Cromwell, although a member of Parliament, artfully contrived to obtain permission to continue in the army, and was made lieutenant, but soon became, in fact, the general of the entire army, Fairfax being merely an instrument in his hands. Under his management, every regiment assumed the appearance of the most intense piety; officers and men met regularly for religious exercises; and they sang hymns as they advanced to battle. Soon after this, a very decisive victory was gained over the king's forces at Naseby (naze'be), chiefly through the skill and valor of Cromwell (June 14, 1645).

36. After this battle, many of the towns which were held by the Royalists surrendered to Fairfax, who at last laid siege to Bristol, then occupied by Prince Rupert. This too was finally taken, and Charles, after other disasters, fled to Newark, and thence escaped to Oxford. The armies under Fairfax and Cromwell soon afterward reduced all the western and middle counties to submission; and the Earl of Montrose in Scotland, who had gained several important victories over the Covenanters, was finally vanquished. Meanwhile, Archbishop Laud was, by an "ordinance" of Parliament, as it was called, tried for treason, condemned, and executed (Jan. 10, 1645).

37. The king being now reduced to the greatest extremity, resolved to leave Oxford, which was on the point of falling into the hands of Fairfax, and to yield himself up to the Scottish army at Newark, knowing that the Scots had already gained everything for which they had contended, and that they had become disgusted with the dominant influence of the Independents in Parliament. He was received with respect, but treated as a prisoner, and compelled to issue orders for the surrender of all his remaining garrisons (May, 1646). The Parliament desiring to gain possession of the fallen monarch, at last agreed to pay the Scots £400,000, in lieu of all demands, on condition that he should be given up; and accordingly he was surrendered to the English commissioners (Jan. 30, 1647).

them; and in order to obtain control of affairs, took the king by force from the Parliament commissioners, and placed him under the protection of the army. This being resented by Parliament and its adherents in London, the leaders marched the army into the city, and reduced both it and the parliament to submission. Charles was treated by his captors with respect and kindness; but, escaping from the confinement in which he was held, he fled to the Isle of Wight, where he was kept a prisoner by the governor in Carisbrook Castle.

39. Under the direction of Cromwell and the other army officers, Parliament now made proposals of settlement to the king; and these being rejected by him, voted that no further addresses should be made to him, thus practically dethroning him altogether (January 13, 1648). He was then shut up in close confinement, and all correspondence with his friends was strictly prohibited. This treatment of the king greatly displeased the Scots; and the Scottish Parliament having voted to raise an army to support his authority, preparations were made to invade England and form a combination with the Royalists. While Cromwell and the army were exerting themselves to oppose these efforts, the Presbyterians in Parliament regained their power, and annulling its previous acts, again entered into negotiations with the king.

40. A treaty was at last made with him, and adopted by a considerable majority in the House of Commons; but Cromwell, in the mean time, had defeated the Scots, and the council of officers causing the parliament-house to be surrounded with two regiments of soldiers, under Col. Pride, formerly a drayman, excluded all who were not favorable to their views (Dec. 6, 1648). This measure, called "Col. Pride's Purge," reduced the Parliament to about fifty members, by whom the vote in favor of the treaty was rescinded, and a trial of the king ordered on the charge of treason against the people.

41. A court was accordingly organized to try him. It consisted of one hundred and thirty-three members, among whom were the chief officers of the army, including Cromwell; and was presided over by John Bradshaw, a lawyer. Its sessions were held at Westminster Hall, and the king was called upon to answer to the charges brought against him. Charles acted with the courage and dignity becoming his character. He refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court, though thrice brought before it; and demanded a conference with Parliament. This was refused, and sentence of death was pronounced against him. Three days afterward, in front of the banqueting-hall of Whitehall Palace, he was beheaded (January 30, 1649).

42. The character of Charles I. was in many respects worthy of commendation. In the private relations of life his conduct was quite exemplary, being entirely free from those vices which so often sully the character of kings. As a monarch, his principal fault was insincerity, by which he lost the confidence of his people; for he gave his assent to measures of reform which he subsequently endeavored to evade. His arbitrary policy finds some apology in the fact that his predecessors had exercised the same powers which he claimed; but his prudence and moderation were not sufficient to convince him that the great change which had taken place in the sentiments of the people necessitated a corresponding change in the royal pretensions; since the influence of authority can never prevail over that of public opinion.

42. What is said of the character of Charles I.?

1649 43. The Commonwealth.—The Scots had to protested against the trial and execution of the 1660 king, and foreign nations had interceded in his behalf. The Prince of Wales, anxious to save his father's life, sent a blank sheet of paper, subscribed with his name and sealed with his arms, on which the judges might write what conditions they pleased, as the price of the king's release; but these men were not to be moved from their purpose. A few days after the execution of the king, the Commons voted to abolish the House of Lords as well as the monarchy, declared it high treason to acknowledge Charles, the Prince of Wales, King of England, and ordered a new seal to be engraved with the legend, "The first year of freedom by God's blessing restored, 1648."

44. Having thus made an entire change in the outward form of government, the Commons next appointed a Council of State, consisting of forty-one members; and of this the regicide Bradshaw was made president. The real head of the government, however, was Oliver Cromwell, who with Desborough, his brother-in-law, Ire'ton, his son-in-law, and others, wielded the power of the army, then nearly 50,000 strong. Affairs in Scotland and Ireland first claimed their attention. In the former, Charles II. had been proclaimed king; and in the latter the authority of the Parliament was defied, and a civil war had for some time been raging.

45. Cromwell, as Lord-Lieutenant, having almost subdued the rebellion in Ireland, by the most dreadful slaughter of the insurgents, next proceeded to Scotland, where the young king had landed, and was supported by a considerable army, partly consisting of English Royalists. Cromwell marched to Edinburgh, but found it too strongly fortified to be attacked. His position on the sea-shore, near Dunbar, was very critical; for he was unable to advance or retreat, and was cut off from any supplies. The Scots, however, rashly marched to attack him, and were most disastrously defeated, the greater number of them being either killed or captured (Sept. 3, 1650). Edinburgh immediately surrendered, and the remnant of the Scottish army fled to Stirling.

46. Charles, a few months after this, was crowned at Scone; * but becoming disgusted with the restraint under which he was kept by the Covenanters, he resolved to march into England, expecting to obtain there large accessions to his army. But in this he was disappointed; and being promptly pursued by Cromwell, was defeated at Worcester (woos'ter), where the whole Scottish army was either killed or taken prisoners (Sept. 3, 1651), the few that escaped from the battle-field being massacred by the country people, from national antipathy. This was styled by Cromwell his "crowning mercy." Charles escaped from England with great difficulty, being obliged to travel for two months in the disguise of a peasant. At one time he concealed himself for twenty-four hours in a large oak-tree, while his pursuers passed by. This tree was afterward known as the Royal Oak.

47. The affairs of the English republic, under the administration of the Parliament, continued to be prosperous. The Portuguese, who had aided Prince Rupert in making his escape, were humbled by Admiral Blake; the subjugation of Ireland was completed by Ireton, and Scotland was entirely reduced to submission by General Monk, whom Cromwell had left to complete the work commenced by the victory at Dunbar. The people were disarmed, the preachers silenced, and all opposition immediately quelled at the point of the sword. The American settlements, all of which except those of New England had adhered to the king, were subdued, as were likewise the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, and the Isle of Man. The latter had been bravely and persistently defended by the Countess of Derby. This complete submission of the British territories left the parliament free to attend to foreign enterprises.

48. The first of these was a war with the Dutch Republic, which was provoked by the haughty behavior of the Dutch toward the English minister St. John, and the encouragement and hospitality shown toward the English Royalists. To cripple their commerce, the parliament passed the famous "Navigation Act," prohibiting all nations from importing any merchandise into England or her colonies except in English ships, or in the ships of the country where the goods were produced (1651). By this law the Dutch were the chief sufferers, they being at this time the chief commercial nation of Europe. Admiral Blake, with an inferior force, encountered the Dutch fleet under Van Tromp; and the latter, after losing two of his ships, was compelled to retire (1652).

49. Several engagements followed between Blake and the Dutch admirals Van Tromp and De Ruyter, in which both nations contended with the utmost skill and bravery for the mastery of the ocean: the balance of victory was, however, on the side of the English (1652-3). Meanwhile, Cromwell perceiving that the parliament had become jealous of his power, determined to dissolve it. Accordingly, going to the House with a body of 300 soldiers, he loaded the members with the vilest reproaches, and bade them

“to be gone and give place to honester men.” Seizing the mace, he exclaimed, “Take away this bauble!” Then commanding the soldiers to clear the hall, he ordered the doors to be locked; and putting the keys into his pocket, departed to his lodgings in Whitehall (April 20, 1653).

50. Desiring, however, to preserve some of the forms of the republic, he issued writs for the election of 140 persons, who might constitute a parliament. These, by his management, consisted of the meanest and most fanatical of the citizens; one of whom, a leather-seller named Praise-God Barebone, having made himself conspicuous by his sanctimonious cant and long prayers, the Parliament was called, in derision, “Barebone’s Parliament.” Cromwell, however, soon dissolved this ridiculous assembly, and caused himself to be appointed “Lord Protector.” He was to be assisted by a Council of State, and was bound to summon a parliament every three years (Dec., 1653).

51. A few months previously, Van Tromp, the distinguished Dutch admiral, had been shot in an action with the English; and the Dutch, terrified by their losses and overwhelmed with the expenses of the war, solicited peace. A treaty was finally signed by Cromwell, establishing a defensive league between the two republics, but yielding the honor of the flag to the English (1654). The administration of the Protector was, in other respects, characterized by extraordinary vigor and ability. He boasted that he would make the name of Englishman as much feared and respected as had anciently been that of Roman; and the uniform success of his military and naval enterprises went far to realize the saying.

52. Under Blake, the English fleets achieved an uninterrupted series of victories. He subdued the Barbary Powers (1655), and defeated the Spaniards in several important actions (1656-7). His death occurred in 1657. Blake was an inflexible republican, and, as such, he disapproved of the usurpations of Cromwell, notwithstanding the honors which the latter heaped upon him. During the war waged with Spain, the island of Jamaica was taken by an English squadron under Admirals Penn* and Venables (1655); and Dunkirk was captured from the Spaniards by the combined forces of France and England (1658), and, by agreement, delivered to Cromwell.

53. Although prosperous abroad, the Protector was at home involved in very great difficulties. He had called two parliaments successively; but not finding them subservient to his views, he had promptly dissolved them (1554-6). His military enterprises had involved him in heavy debt; conspiracies, one after the other, were formed against his government; and discontents arose in the army itself. A book entitled "Killing no Murder," published by one Colonel Titus, and boldly advising the removal of the usurper by assassination, caused him thereafter ceaseless apprehension and anxiety. He constantly wore armor under his clothes, and carried pistols in his pockets; scarcely ever slept three nights in the same chamber, or returned from any place by the same way which he went. At last this dreadful anxiety of mind, coupled with grief for the loss of a favorite daughter, brought on a fever, of which he expired (Sept. 3, 1658),—the anniversary of the day of his great victories at Dunbar and Worcester.

54. Cromwell was in his sixtieth year when he died. He was of a robust frame of body, and of a manly, though not an agreeable aspect. His eyes were grey and keen, his nose immoderately large, and of a deep red; and his manner uniformly abrupt and clownish. His character had very many traits of greatness. No one can gainsay the splendid talents which he displayed, both as a general and a statesman; and had he rightfully possessed the sovereign power, he would undoubtedly have compared favorably with any monarch that ever reigned, both for ability and uprightness of intentions. But his perverted ambition, not content with vindicating the liberties and redressing the grievances of his country, prompted him to "wade through slaughter to a throne;" and, therefore, instead of receiving the benedictions of his countrymen, he was execrated and abhorred.

55. Richard Cromwell quietly succeeded his father in the office of Protector. He was a young man of no experience, and very little strength of character, though of a mild and virtuous disposition. His want of capacity for so difficult a position was soon manifest, notwithstanding the support which he received from General Monk, who commanded the army in Scotland, and from his brother Henry, as Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. A parliament was called, but it having given offence to the army officers, the latter compelled Richard to dissolve it (1659). Soon after this he signed his own abdication, and thus left the supreme authority to the army, who afterward ruled by a council of officers.

56. The country was now threatened with a renewal of civil war; but General Monk, a man of great caution and reserve, marched into England with the avowed intention of restoring the parliament which Cromwell had violently expelled. This was accomplished, the members generally taking their places; and the Presbyterians and Royalists forming a coalition against the Independents. Under Monk's direction, this parliament was formally dissolved, and writs issued for the election of a new one. In the latter, a majority was found in favor of restoring the king; and when his messenger appeared, he was received with the greatest joy; the terms offered were at once accepted, and the king was proclaimed with great solemnity by both Houses (May 8, 1660). A few days afterward, Charles entered London, amid the joyful acclamations of the citizens (May 29), and reascended the throne of his ancestors. This event is known in English history as the Restoration.

1660 57. Charles II. was thirty years old when, after to an exile of sixteen years, he was restored to his 1678 throne. His cheerful disposition, and easy, graceful manners made him a very engaging person; and he won the hearts of all who approached him by his manly figure and his frankness and affability. Sir Edward Hyde, now created Earl of Clarendon, who had returned with the king from exile, was made chancellor and prime minister, and soon afterward became connected with the royal family by the marriage of his daughter, Anne Hyde, with the king's brother, James, Duke of York. General Monk was rewarded with the title of Duke of Albemarle.

58. Among the first acts of the restored king's reign were the abolition of the last relic of the Feudal System—the tenure of lands by knight's service,* the disbanding of Cromwell's army, and the restoration of the Church of England. An act was also passed pardoning all who had taken part in the Great Rebellion, except the regicide judges, six of whom were tried and executed. On the anniversary of the late king's death, the bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, and Bradshaw were disinterred, hanged on the gallows, then decapitated, and their heads fixed on Westminster Hall. With this exception, the king showed great moderation and clemency, and admitted into his council both Royalists and Presbyterians. In Scotland more severity was exercised, and the Marquis of Argyle was beheaded for having favored the usurped government.

* This was originally an obligation imposed upon the holder of a certain extent of land, called a Knight's Fee, to perform the duties of a knight to his superior or lord. Afterward, a money compensation was allowed as an equivalent, which in time led to many abuses.

59. In compliance with the wishes of Charles and his minister, the "Act of Uniformity" was passed, requiring that every clergyman should be ordained by the bishops, and should declare his assent to everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and should abjure the Covenant. Two thousand clergymen were expelled from their livings for refusing obedience (1662). The "Corporation Act," passed at the same time, enjoined all magistrates and officers of corporations to take an oath never, under any circumstance, to resist the king's authority, or to take up arms against him.

60. The most remarkable feature of this period was the entire change which took place in the sentiments of the people. During the reign of Charles I. they manifested the most intense zeal for liberty; but now seemed eager to evince an equally extravagant spirit of submission. Under the control of the Puritans, they seemed to think that religion consisted in gloom, austerity, and the sacrifice of all social gayety and pleasure; but, going to the opposite extreme, they now plunged into riot and dissipation. Everything religious or serious was ridiculed; and nothing but scenes of gallantry and festivity occupied the general attention. The monarch set the example, and indulged himself in mirth and festivity, while those who had suffered in his father's cause were left to pine in neglect and wretchedness.

61. In the third year of his reign, Charles married Catharine of Braganza, a Portuguese princess, with whom he received a large dowry; but finding her disposition serious and her manners formal and grave, he entirely neglected her for the society of his gay and dissolute companions. After a short time, his profusion and reckless self-indulgence considerably abated the people's loyalty; and they could not forbear making comparisons between this slothful and licentious monarch and the great Protector who had made the name of England so glorious throughout the world by his careful and vigorous administration. Dunkirk, which had been acquired during that splendid period, was now sold to the French to supply means for the king's extravagant pleasures (1664).

62. But scarcely any amount was found adequate for this purpose; and in order to obtain supplies from Parliament, he recklessly plunged into a war with Holland, the avowed cause of the war being certain alleged wrongs committed by the Dutch against the English trade. Before the war had been formally declared, a fleet sent out by the Duke of York took possession of New Netherlands in North America (1664), and some of the Dutch settlements in Africa were captured. De Ruyter retaliated by attacking Barbadoes and some of the other English dependencies. At the beginning of the war, a great naval battle was fought off the eastern coast of England, in which James, the Duke of York, assisted by Prince Rupert and the Earl of Sandwich, defeated the Dutch fleet with immense loss (1665).

63. The French monarch (Louis XIV.) then took sides with the Dutch, alarmed lest the English might acquire an unlimited control of maritime affairs. The King of Denmark also declared war against England. The combined fleets of the allies, commanded by the great Dutch admiral De Ruyter and the Duke of Beaufort, were defeated by those of the English, under the Duke of Albemarle and Prince Rupert (1666). This battle lasted four days, and was one of the most terrific naval engagements ever fought: it occurred near the southeast coast. By it the English gained the unquestioned supremacy of the sea, and were able with impunity to insult the Dutch in their own harbors.

64. During this war, the Great Plague broke out in London; and such was the awful mortality occasioned by it, that in the city alone the number of deaths during the year (1665) was estimated at no less than 100,000. The rich and panic-stricken fled from the city; grass grew in the streets; and the silence of death reigned everywhere, except when it was broken by the rumbling of the dead-cart as it carried away its fearful burden. Close upon this calamity followed the Great Fire, which raged for three days, and destroyed 13,200 dwelling-houses, besides ninety churches (1666). St. Paul's cathedral was burned; but on its site was afterward erected, by the distinguished architect Christopher Wren, that beautiful edifice, the dome of which now towers above the smoke-stained roofs of London.*

65. The desire of Charles to save expense, in order that he might have means for his extravagant pleasures, led to neglect in keeping up the naval force of the kingdom; and the Dutch, taking advantage of this, defiantly entered the

He also drew designs for more than fifty other churches in place of those destroyed by the fire, and formed a plan for the entire rebuilding of the metropolis, embracing wide streets, magnificent quays, and other valuable improvements. He died in 1723, in his 91st year.

harbors, and did immense havoc to the shipping. They even sailed up the Thames, and extended their ravages as far as London Bridge (1667). Peace was, however, declared the same year. The disgraceful close of this war, together with the previous measures of the government, excited intense indignation among the people, particularly against Clarendon, who was accordingly impeached and banished. He survived his banishment six years, which he spent in France, employing his leisure in the composition of his great work, the "History of the Rebellion."

66. After the fall of Clarendon, five ministers were chosen, whose unprincipled intrigues subsequently caused them to be stigmatized as the "Cabal."* Their first measure was, however, very popular. This was the formation of a league with Holland and Sweden (hence called the "Triple Alliance") for the purpose of restraining the French king, Louis XIV., in his ambitious scheme of seizing the Spanish Netherlands.† Louis was thus obliged to abandon the enterprise, and to submit to the terms agreed upon by the plenipotentiaries of the three countries, among whom England was represented by the celebrated Sir William Temple,‡ and Holland by the famous statesman John de Witt.§

67. Charles, however, disliked the alliance against Louis, although so acceptable to the people, because he hoped, by means of aid received from that monarch, to make himself independent of the English parliament. He, therefore, secretly concluded with Louis a most disgraceful treaty, agreeing to assist him in subjugating Holland, and to make a public profession of the Roman Catholic religion. In return, he was to receive a large sum of money (£200,000) yearly, and was promised an army in case of an insurrection in England (1670). The negotiations by which this was brought about were chiefly carried on by the Duchess of Orleans, the sister of Charles, aided by a beautiful French lady, who afterward came to England, and having won the favor of the king, was made Duchess of Portsmouth.

† That part of the Netherlands which remained in the possession of Spain after the Dutch provinces had revolted, and achieved their independence. It chiefly consisted of the present kingdom of Belgium.

‡ Sir William Temple was especially celebrated for his skill as a negotiator. After spending twenty years in the affairs of state, he retired in 1680 from public employment, and spent the remainder of his life in literary pursuits and in the cultivation of his grounds. He died in 1700, at the age of seventy-one. His works, consisting chiefly of memoirs of public affairs, are very valuable.

§ John De Witt, for several years "Grand Pensionary" of Holland, was noted for his scientific attainments, eminent ability as a statesman, and incorruptible integrity. He was at the head of affairs during the wars with England under Cromwell and Charles II., but uniformly deprecated a warlike policy on the part of the two countries. His hatred of the Orange family and the Stadtholder was intense, and involved him in many troubles. During a popular insurrection occasioned by the invasion of the French in 1672, the odium of which was attached to him, he and his brother were seized by the enraged mob, and murdered with every circumstance of indignity and cruelty.

68. One of the most dishonorable acts of Charles's government, in order to obtain supplies, was the closing of the Exchequer, or Treasury, in which the London merchants and goldsmiths had deposited their funds, on which they were now told that they would receive only the interest, as the principal would not be paid (1672). General bankruptcy and ruin followed this shameful violation of public credit; and all trade was for a time completely paralyzed. Other measures adopted by the king without the consent of Parliament were of an arbitrary and unconstitutional character.

69. A few months later, England joined France in a war against the Dutch; and while the fleets of the latter contended against those of the English, commanded by the Duke of York, the French army invaded the territory of the republic, captured many of its cities, and drove it to the extreme measure of opening the sluices, and inundating the country. In these perilous circumstances, the Dutch forces were commanded by William, Prince of Orange,* who gained great distinction by his determined courage and patriotism. The war continued about two years, at the end of which it had become so unpopular, that the king was compelled to make a treaty of peace with the Dutch provinces (1674).

70. While this war was in progress, the "Test Act" had been passed by Parliament (1673), obliging all government officers to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and to abjure the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. In consequence of this, the Duke of York, who had previously made a public profession of his faith in that church, resigned his office as admiral, and was succeeded in the command of the fleet by Prince Rupert. The subsequent marriage of the Duke with a Catholic princess (Mary of Modena) very much increased the popular feeling against him.

71. The general distrust and suspicion felt at this time against the Catholics, led to what was called the "Popish Plot" (1678). This was a conspiracy alleged to have been formed by the Catholics to set fire to the city of London, assassinate the king, massacre the Protestants, and betray the kingdom to the French. The principal witness in this absurd accusation was one Titus Oates,* whose false and malicious statements were received with implicit confidence, and occasioned the wildest excitement. The rewards bestowed upon him led others to commit similar perjuries, and many innocent persons suffered death before the imposture was discovered. The most illustrious of these victims was William Howard, Viscount Stafford, whose gray hairs could not save him from an unmerited death. He was condemned, after a trial of six days, and perished on the scaffold, amid the loudly-expressed sympathies of the spectators (Dec. 29, 1680).

72. The year preceding this event was rendered memorable by the passage of the famous "Ha'beas Cor'pus Act,"* securing all subjects from imprisonment, except where it can be shown to be justified by law. This was designed to check the illegal and arbitrary arrests made by the authority of the king, who in many respects exercised the most despotic sway. He deprived many of the cities, London included, of their charters, in order to extort money for their restoration; and no one felt himself secure from the numerous gangs of spies and informers who were employed by the court.

73. This state of things led to a conspiracy called the "Rye-house Plot," from the name of the house in which the conspirators met, it being situated at a place called Rye, a lonely spot on the road by which the king returned from Newmarket to London. The plan was to overturn a cart, so that the king's coach would be stopped, and then to rush out and assassinate him. The failure and discovery of this plot brought to light the existence of another combination, the object of which was to create a revolution by dethroning Charles, and placing his natural son, the Duke of Monmouth, on the throne, or at least to compel Charles to acknowledge him as his successor, there being a rumor that his mother had been lawfully married to the king.

74. The chief members of this combination were the Duke of Monmouth, Lord William Russell, Algernon Sidney, John Hampden (grandson of the distinguished patriot of that name), the Earl of Essex, and Lord Howard. On the evidence of some of the conspirators, Russell and Sidney were beheaded; but Monmouth escaped by flight (1683). The fate of Lord Russell, who was a most virtuous nobleman, excited the deepest sympathy; and that of Sidney,* who was in principle a Republican, and had fought in the civil war against the late king, was also greatly regretted. Hampden was punished only by the imposition of a heavy fine; and Monmouth, having made a humble submission to the king, was pardoned.

* Habeas Corpus means, "have the body." The writ, or order of the court of justice, was so called because it enjoins any person restraining another's liberty, to have his body, that is, to produce the prisoner, before the court, so that the cause of his detention may be known.

75. A short time after this, Charles married his niece, the Lady Anne, daughter of the Duke of York, to Prince George, brother to the King of Denmark, thinking to increase his popularity by allying himself thus closely to a Protestant prince. The death of the king soon followed, being caused by an apoplectic fit (1685). During his last illness he received the offices of the Catholic church. The only redeeming traits of his character were his affability, ease, and cheerfulness as a companion. In other respects, he was most unworthy, being utterly unprincipled, and immoral in the lowest degree. His whole court was steeped in vice and profligacy; and the tone of society, in every grade, was affected by his degrading example. With no natural disposition to tyranny, his recklessness and extravagance caused him to disregard the most sacred privileges of his subjects, and to trample, without scruple, upon their dearest liberties. He left no legitimate children, and therefore the crown descended to his brother James.

76. In the first part of the reign of Charles II. (1667), the celebrated poet, John Milton, published his greatest

* Sidney was the second son of Robert, Earl of Leicester. He made Brutus his model, in his political character; and on Cromwell's usurpation he retired in disgust from the country. work, "Paradise Lost." This illustrious man had been Foreign Secretary under Cromwell, and had distinguished himself by his writings in defence of the Commonwealth. His principal contemporaries in the field of literature were John Bunyan, the author of "Pilgrim's Progress;" Samuel Butler, who wrote "Hudibras," a burlesque poem on the Puritans and the civil war; and John Locke, the author of the immortal "Essay on the Human Understanding." Dryden also wrote several of his finest poems, and was made poet-laureate. The drama received many talented contributions from Ot'way, Wych'erly, and others; but, taking its character from the court, it was shamefully immoral. Sir Matthew Hale, the just and pious judge, also flourished during this period.

1685 77. James II.—No opposition was made to the to accession of the Duke of York, his title being generally recognized as indisputable; but notwithstanding the glory which he had acquired as a naval commander, he was viewed with distrust by the people on account of the attachment which he had openly manifested to the church of Rome. Soon after the coronation of James and his queen, Parliament assembled, in his address to which the king showed something of the same spirit of defiance which had involved his father in so much trouble. All the chief offices of the crown continued in the hands of Protestants.

78. The Duke of Monmouth, who had fled to Holland during the preceding reign, now, under the instigation of the Earl of Argyle, an exiled nobleman from Scotland, renewed his claim to the throne. Argyle landed in the western part of Scotland, but was soon defeated, taken prisoner, and a short time afterward executed at Edinburgh. Monmouth landed in England with scarcely one hundred followers, but was soon joined by a considerable force, and proceeded slowly into the interior of the country. At Sedgemoor he was met by the royal army, and, after a battle of three hours, defeated with great slaughter. Monmouth fled, but in a few days was found concealed in a ditch, and taken to London. In an interview with the king he threw himself on his knees, and implored forgiveness; but as he had plotted several times against the government, and had publicly proclaimed James a traitor, a tyrant, the murderer of his brother, and a popish usurper, the king was deaf to his entreaties. Two days afterward he was beheaded (1685).

79. Those who had been concerned in this rebellion were pursued with the most dreadful ferocity, an officer named Kirke acquiring a disgraceful notoriety by the shocking cruelties perpetrated by his soldiers, who were ironically styled "Kirke's Lambs." Trials were held under the infamous Judge Jeffries; and many innocent persons were condemned and executed. This circuit was called the "Bloody Assize," Jeffries boasting of the large number of persons (more than three hundred) whom he had caused to be hanged. More than eight hundred others were sent as slaves to the West Indies, under the orders of court favorites to whom they had been granted, and who made a shameful gain by their sale, or extorted various sums for their liberation. Two women were executed for sheltering fugitives, and their case excited much compassion, more especially that of Alice Lisle (lile), widow of one of Cromwell's lords, who was sentenced by Jeffries to be burned alive; but through the intercession of friends, her sentence was changed to beheading.

and dissatisfaction. Having published on his own authority, and in opposition to the Test Act, a declaration allowing liberty of conscience, and declaring that non-conformity to the established religion should no longer be punished, he issued an order requiring that this declaration should be read in all the churches. This, as being illegal, the clergy refused to obey; and a petition was presented against it by seven bishops, including Archbishop Sancroft. James, greatly exasperated at this opposition, caused the bishops to be committed to the Tower, where they remained a week before they were set free on bail (1688).

81. The popular excitement produced by this conduct of the king was intense. Crowds attended the bishops as they were conducted from the Tower, and signified their sympathy and veneration in every possible way. The trial took place in Westminster Hall, the bishops being charged with having published a false and seditious libel; and when the jury had delivered their verdict, "Not Guilty," and the bishops were discharged, the city of London was illuminated, and the people became almost frantic with joy. During these exciting events the queen gave birth to a son; and a rumor was spread by the Protestant party that the child had been brought into the palace, in order to be imposed upon the people as an heir to the crown. The infant was baptized by the name of James.

82. The king expecting opposition, had collected a standing army of about 16,000 men; but these openly expressed their sympathy with the Protestant party. By the advice of the French minister, James had obtained several regiments of Irish soldiers, in whom, as being Catholics, it was thought reliance could be placed. These were hated by the English; and a popular air, called from its burden Lillebulerero, still further fanned the flame against James and the Irish troops. In the mean time, some of the leading nobles and clergy of England had sent to William, Prince of Orange, nephew and son-in-law of the king, entreating him to come with an army and aid them in defending their religion and their freedom.

83. William promptly accepted the call, and having collected an army of 14,000 men and a fleet of five hundred ships, he sailed from Holland, and landed safely and without opposition at Torbay, on the southern shore (Nov. 5, 1688). He was received with acclamations of joy by the people, and advanced slowly, reaching Exeter in four days. James at first resolved to stake his kingdom on the issue of a great battle; but being abandoned by his subjects, among them Lord Churchill (afterward so celebrated as the Duke of Marlborough), and other distinguished noblemen; and being deserted also by his daughter Anne, and her husband, Prince George, he resolved on flight. Having previously sent away his queen and son to France, he followed them in disguise; but was captured and brought back. His enemies were, however, not desirous of retaining him; and, the Dutch soldiers having occupied London, he was permitted again to escape; whereupon he sailed away to France, and joined his wife at the castle of St. Germain, near Paris, being received by Louis XIV. with the greatest sympathy and kindness.

84. A convention parliament was immediately called (Jan. 23, 1689), and the crown was bestowed on William and Mary for their lives, the former to have the sole administration of the government. The succession was settled, first on the children of Mary, and then on those of her sister Anne; and, these failing, on the children of William by any other wife. Annexed to this settlement was a Declaration of Rights, definitely fixing the extent of the king's prerogative, and more precisely stating the constitutional principles of the government.

85. Among these the chief articles were: 1. The king cannot suspend the laws or their execution; 2. He cannot levy money without the consent of Parliament; 3. The subject has a right to petition the crown; 4. A standing army cannot be kept in time of peace without the consent of Parliament; 5. Elections and parliamentary debates must be free, and parliaments must be frequently assembled. These acts of the Convention were afterward confirmed by a parliament regularly summoned, in an enactment called the "Bill of Rights," and constituted what is known in English history as the "Glorious Revolution of 1688."*

86. James spent the remainder of his life at St. Germain's, a pensioner on the bounty of the French king. He died there in 1701. His character is variously drawn, in accordance with the partisan views of those who have delineated it. By some, his zeal for his religion is represented as sectarian bigotry, and his ardor in vindicating its freedom becomes perversity and spite. His rash violation of the laws, and his defiance of the Constitution of the country, were characteristic of the whole Stuart race, every member of which was distinguished by a blind resistance to public opinion. In these things, James evidently proved that he was incapable of learning by experience. While, therefore, his character cannot be held up to admiration, it should be spared very much of the obloquy to which his indiscretions and the disasters consequent thereon have rendered it liable.

taining, at the time of the Revolution, one hundred and seventy-three vessels, manned by 42,000 seamen. James, who had displayed considerable talents as an admiral, took great interest in this branch of the service, and was the inventor of naval signals. During this and the preceding reign, the country advanced greatly in wealth and commerce; and the population of its colonial territories was considerably augmented. Newspapers had been established in the reign of Charles I., but the jealousy and arbitrary conduct of the crown prevented their free publication; and thus the coffee-houses became the chief places for the circulation of news, and the discussion of political opinions. The government regarded these places with much suspicion, and at one time made an ineffectual effort to close them.

1689 88. William and Mary.—William, on whom to the sole exercise of regal power devolved, although an 1694 able sovereign, was deficient in those personal qualities which are needed to acquire popularity; and hence he had scarcely ascended the throne, when opposition confronted him from various quarters,—even from some of those who had been instrumental in his elevation. Suspecting disaffection among the Scotch regiments in the English army, he resolved to send them to Holland, and supply their places with Dutch troops. They, however, indignant at the order requiring them to leave the country, mutinied, and marched northward. William promptly despatched several regiments of Dutch dragoons after them, and compelled them to submit to the order. This caused the passage of the Mutiny Bill, which placed the army under martial law.

89. Although the clergy had been, in a great degree, instrumental in accomplishing the Revolution, a large number, including the primate and seven bishops, refused to take the oath of allegiance to William, on the ground that they could not be released from the oath which they had previously taken to James. On this account they were called "non-jurors," and were punished by ejection from their livings. This led to the passage of the "Toleration Act," by which Protestant dissenters were exempted from the penalties incurred by the free exercise of their religion. The disabilities of the Catholics were, however, continued in full force.

90. Although William had been acknowledged king by the Scotch convention in Edinburgh, there was a considerable party in favor of James. Under Viscount Dundee (more celebrated as Graham of Claverhouse), an army of Highlanders defeated the royal forces;* but Dundee was slain; and the insurgents were so much discouraged by his death that they dispersed. The Scots were, accordingly, soon reduced to submission, after which Episcopacy was abolished, Presbyterianism being established in its place (1689). The full pacification of the Highlands was not effected, however, until some time afterward (December, 1691).

91. In connection with this occurred the dreadful "Massacre of Glencoe" (1692). McLan, chief of the McDonalds, had delayed to take the oath of allegiance to William, until after the time appointed for it; whereupon the enemies of the McDonalds obtained from the king, by a false statement, an order for the military execution of the whole clan. Accordingly, a body of soldiers entered the valley of Glencoe, and put to the sword all who were unable to escape, including men, women, and children. The signing of this order very much increased William's unpopularity, and has since subjected his name to considerable obloquy.

92. In Ireland, the opposition to William was much but in an engagement which took place off Cape La Hogue (hög), the combined Dutch and English fleets, under Admiral Russell, gained a brilliant victory over the French (May 22, 1692), and the exiled monarch again sought an asylum at the court of Louis. He made no further effort to recover his lost throne, but passed the remainder of his life in retirement.

96. The war, however, still went on, and William met with several disastrous losses in his campaigns in Flanders, as well as in the naval engagements which occurred with the French. This encouraged his enemies in England, who were busy in their intrigues with the French. To these misfortunes was added the loss of his queen, who died of small-pox (1694), leaving him sole ruler of the kingdom. Mary was possessed of many excellent qualities; and as a queen, her conduct was very exemplary. As a daughter, she has been deemed unfeeling and ungrateful; since she appeared to be without sympathy for her father's misfortunes. Due consideration must, however, be given to the peculiar circumstances in which she was placed, in passing a judgment on her character and conduct.

1694 97. William III.—The death of Mary revived to the hopes of the friends of James II., and several 1702 conspiracies were formed in his favor; but they were unsuccessful. William carried on the war against France with great vigor, and gained several splendid victories (1695). This not only discouraged and humbled the French monarch, but frustrated the schemes of his enemies, the Jacobites, in England. At last, by the treaty of Ryswick,* peace was concluded with France, Louis consenting to resign several of his conquests, and to acknowledge William as king of England (Sept. 10, 1697).

98. As William had predicted, this treaty only proved a short truce, hostilities being soon renewed. Charles II., King of Spain, having died childless, bequeathed his crown to Philip, Duke of Anjou, grandson of Louis XIV. William at first acknowledged the new king of Spain, though with considerable reluctance and dissatisfaction; but the Emperor of Germany commenced a war to prevent this increase of the French monarch's power; and finally induced England and Holland to join him in a league, known in history as the "Grand Alliance" (Sept. 7, 1701). A few days after this, James II. died at St. Germain; and Louis at once proclaimed his son King of Great Britain and Ireland, thus violating the peace of Ryswick. Before, however, war was formally declared by Parliament, William met with an accident which proved fatal. He broke his collar-bone by a fall from his horse, and, in a little over a fortnight afterward, expired (March 8, 1702).

99. William was an able sovereign and statesman, as well as a most excellent general, being equally remarkable for sagacity in planning his campaigns and coolness and intrepidity in the time of battle. His frame was feeble, and he constantly suffered from ill health. To all but a very few personal friends, his manners were cold and distant; and therefore most of his subjects regarded him with dislike. England, indeed, was always to him a foreign country, which he governed with wisdom, but always so as to gratify his intense ambition and love of military glory. In literature and science he took very little interest. The establishment of a standing army and the accumulation of a great national debt* were some of the results of William's rule, and his expensive foreign wars.

* The first regular loan to the government was £1,200,000, the capital of the Bank of England, incorporated in 1694, having been projected by William Paterson, a Scotchman. At the peace of Ryswick, the National Debt of England amounted to fifty millions of pounds. It is now more than eight hundred millions.

1702 100. Anne.—In accordance with the terms of the to settlement, Anne, wife of Prince George of Denmark, and second daughter of James II., succeeded to the throne. She was thirty-eight years of age, and a member of the Church of England. In her first address to Parliament she expressed her desire that England should maintain its place in the Grand Alliance, and war was accordingly declared against France. In this war, known in history as the "War of the Spanish Succession," the Duke of Marlborough* had the chief command of the English and Dutch forces. During the first and second campaigns (1702-3), he made some conquests in Flanders; and in the next (1704), he defeated the French and Bavarians with great loss in the memorable battle of Blenheim† (blen'hime), in which the imperial troops were commanded by the famous Prince Eugene.‡ During the same year, the English fleet, under Sir George Rooke, captured Gibraltar; and this strong fortress has ever since remained in the possession of the British.

101. Being badly supported by the imperial army, Marlborough in the following year accomplished but little; but in the next (1706) he gained another brilliant victory over the French at Ramillies (ram'e-leez), and by means of it made almost a complete conquest of Flanders. The French also received the same year a terrible overthrow from Prince Eugene at Tu'rin. The year 1708 was sig-

* John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, was the son of a Cavalier, who was in high favor with the Duke of York; and he married a young lady who was the special friend and favorite of Anne. When, therefore, the latter ascended the throne, she was so much under the influence of Lady Marlborough and the Duke, her husband, that these were regarded as virtually almost the reigning sovereigns, Prince George of Denmark making no interference in English affairs. The correspondence of the queen and her favorite was of the most intimate and confidential character, and was carried on under the names of Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman, the latter name being assumed by the Duchess.

† Blenheim is a small village in Bavaria, on the Danube, twenty-three miles west north-west of Augsburg. (See Progressive Map, No. 6.)

‡ Prince Eugene was born at Paris in 1663. He was the son of Eugene Maurice, Count of Soissons, and of Olympia Mancini, niece of Cardinal Mazarin. He entered into the service of the emperor, and soon gained great distinction, especially in the wars with the Turks. He died in 1736. He was small in stature, simple in dress and manner, and kind-hearted in his treatment to his soldiers.

nalized by another great victory over the French at Oudenarde, which was followed, the next year, by the terrific battle of Malplaquet (mal-plah'ka), in which the allied army under Marlborough routed the French, but with the dreadful loss of 20,000 men. This decided victory finished the war in Flanders (1709).

102. While these events were in progress, there had been many other battles by sea and land. The Earl of Peterborough,* in conjunction with Sir Cloudesly Shovel, took Barcelona; and the former triumphantly traversed a large part of Spain, everywhere proclaiming Charles III. king (1765). On Shovel's return, a part of the fleet was wrecked on the Scilly Islands, and all on board of the admiral's ship perished (1707). Shovel was a commander of great merit, and had raised himself by his courage and talents from the station of a common sailor. The war lingered for several years, being at last closed by the treaty of Utrecht (u'trekt), in 1713. Previous to this, Marlborough was recalled; and being accused of dishonest practices in connection with the army contracts and accounts, was dismissed by the queen from all his employments. The Parliament also passed a vote of censure upon his conduct, whereupon he retired from England in disgust, and took up his abode in the Netherlands (1712).†

103. During the progress of the war, an important political event occurred at home. Disaffection existed in Scotland, and the Parliament of that country passed the "Act of Security," providing that the successor to the Few generals succeeded in accomplishing so much with such slender means, or displayed equal degree of genius and originality. He died in 1735.

† Marlborough returned to England in 1714, on the accession of George I., and was very enthusiastically received by the people. He died in 1722, possessing a reputation for military skill unsurpassed by that of any other English general. As a politician, however, he was insincere and unprincipled, and his avarice betrayed him into many mean and disgraceful actions. He is said to have been so illiterate, that he could not write or even spell his native language correctly.

throne of England, on the queen's death, should not succeed to the throne of Scotland, unless under conditions that would secure the honor and independence of the latter country. This had reference to the settlement already effected* of the English crown on Sophia, wife of the elector of Hanover and grand-daughter of James I., to which arrangement there was much opposition in Scotland. Other proceedings tended to actual hostilities between the two countries, and demonstrated the necessity of a closer union between them. This was effected in 1707, by the passage of the "Act of Union," providing that the two kingdoms should be united under the name of Great Britain; that the crown should be settled on the Princess Sophia and her heirs, being Protestants; and that there should be but one Parliament of the united kingdom.

104. To this act the people of Scotland were compelled to submit; but it occasioned great discontent, and James, son of James II., taking advantage of the feeling, obtained from Louis an armament with which he sailed to Scotland, hoping to raise a general insurrection in his favor. On the Continent he was styled the Chevalier de St. George, but the English styled him the Pretender. The effort failed, several of the French vessels being captured by the English fleet under Admiral Byng (1707). James escaped, and for some years made no further effort to accomplish his object.

105. The year after the treaty of Utrecht, Queen Anne died, and with her terminated the main Stuart line (1714). She was of middle stature, of dark hair and complexion, and of a heavy, dull expression of features. Her amiable and confiding disposition won for her the title of "Good Queen Anne;" but it subjected her to the influence of wily favorites, who took advantage of her generosity. This was the case with the Duchess of Marlborough, who was supplanted by a Mrs. Masham, wife of an officer of the royal household, to whose advice and influence the queen submitted in the most important affairs of the government.

106. The reign of Queen Anne was not only distinguished for its military and political events, but was characterized to such an extent by the progress made in science and literature, that it has been styled the "Augustan Age of England." Addison, Steele, Bolingbroke, and Swift were the most eminent prose writers of this period; the most distinguished poet was Alexander Pope, who published during this period some of his most admired compositions. His poems are characterized by remarkable terseness and brilliancy of expression, and keenness of wit. STATE OF SOCIETY UNDER THE STUARTS.

107. Few nations have undergone so sudden and complete a change in their manners as occurred in England during this period. At the commencement of the century, when James I. ascended the throne, tranquillity, concord, and a general spirit of submission reigned throughout the kingdom; but in a few years all this gave place to faction, fanaticism, and a spirit of rebellion that almost amounted to frenzy. The virulence of party animosity was so great, that no marriages or alliances of any kind were permitted to take place between the members of the hostile factions. "Your friends, the Cavaliers," said a Parliamentarian to a Royalist, "are very dissolute and debauched." "True," replied the Royalist, "they have the infirmities of men; but your friends, the Roundheads, have the vices of devils—tyranny, rebellion, and spiritual pride.”

108. The Cavaliers were indeed gay in their manners and dress, being commonly men of birth and fortune; and they thus presented a marked contrast to the gloomy fanaticism of the Roundheads. The rigid severity of the Presbyterians and Independents permitted no recreations, except such as were afforded by the singing of hymns and psalms. Plays, dances, and all other merry-makings were sinful frivolities: horse-racing and bear-baiting—popular diversions of the time—were wicked enormities. Hence, Colonel Hewson with pious zeal marched his regiment into London and killed all the bears; on which incident Butler based a part of his burlesque poem, styled “Hudibras.”

109. During this period arose also the Quakers or Friends—a sect founded by George Fox, who was born in 1624. He was by trade a shoemaker; but feeling a strong impulse toward spiritual contemplations, he abandoned this occupation, and wandered about the country, preaching the doctrines which had been suggested to his mind during his solitary meditations. Proselytes were soon gained, and a sect formed, peculiar not only in their religious views, but in all their social habits and customs. Their zeal was soon tried by bitter persecution. They were thrown into prison,—sometimes into mad-houses; they were pilloried; they were whipped; they were burned in the face; and their tongues bored with red-hot irons; but nothing could overcome their fortitude, or quench their enthusiasm.

110. Religious persecution marks the entire period, and led to that emigration which caused the establishment of most of the English colonies in North America. The Puritans fled to Massachusetts to escape the intolerance of James I., and his son's arbitrary zeal. The Catholics founded an asylum from English persecution in Maryland; and the Quakers sought civil and religious freedom amid the wilds and wild men of Pennsylvania, after vainly seeking it among their former brethren in affliction, the Puritans of New England.

111. The superstition and ignorance of the age are clearly but terribly demonstrated by the prevailing belief in witchcraft—perhaps the most awful of popular delusions. After the last heretic had suffered death at the stake (1612), the fires were again lighted for the burning of those charged with this mysterious crime. This delusion was not confined to England, but spread over Europe, and extended to this country, where (at Salem) it raged with peculiar virulence. Between 1640 and 1660, it is said some three or four thousand persons, in Europe, fell victims to this terrible delusion.

112. The commerce and navigation of England increased greatly during the peaceful period of Charles the First's reign. The trade to Guinea, the Levant, and the East Indies was quite large; immense quantities of cloth were annually exported to Turkey; and the English possessed almost the monopoly of the traffic with Spain. Interrupted during the civil wars, commerce soon recovered after the Restoration, and received additional encouragement from the losses sustained by the Dutch. Besides, the prevalence of democratical principles induced many of the gentry to educate their sons to mercantile pursuits, and thus commerce became more honorable than it had ever been at any previous time. The trade with the American colonies soon became considerable. At the close of the century, about 500 vessels were employed in this trade and with the West Indies. Of these, however, some were engaged in the slave-trade. A Board of Trade was established in 1670, its first president being the Earl of Sandwich.

113. Tea and coffee were introduced from the East,* but for a long time were so expensive that they were used only as luxuries. Ginger, cloves, pepper, and other spices were also brought from the East Indies, and tobacco became an extensive article of commerce. James I., who had a great dislike to its use, wrote a treatise against it, which he called "The Counterblaste to Tobacco," and in which he described it as "a custom loathsome to the eye, hateful to the nose, harmful to the brain, and dangerous to the lungs." Asparagus, artichokes, cauliflowers, and a variety of other vegetables were also introduced into England during this period. Whale-ships visited the shores of Greenland and Spitzbergen, and an extensive trade in whalebone was commenced, the whale previous to this having been valued only for its oil. Madras and Bombay became important centres of the East Indian trade, Java fell into the hands of the Dutch, but St. Helena became an English possession (1651).

114. Next to the capital, the chief seaport was Bristol, and Norwich the chief manufacturing town. Manchester, now the great centre of the cotton manufacture, was then a small town of about 6,000 inhabitants; Leeds, the great woollen mart, was but little larger; Sheffield and Birmingham were very small towns; and Liverpool, probably, did not contain 200 seamen. The population of London at the death of Charles II. is estimated at half a million. The streets, narrow, dirty, unpaved, and not lighted till the last year of that monarch's reign, were infested with ruffians and robbers, against whom the watchmen, generally old and feeble men, could afford no protection.

115. The first law for erecting turnpikes was passed in 1662. The roads were exceedingly bad, and travelling consequently very difficult. Goods were transported in wagons or on pack-horses; passengers, in stage-coaches, which were slow, lumbering vehicles, with great difficulty drawn through the mud which filled the roads. In 1669, a "Flying Coach," required thirteen hours to pass between Oxford and London—a distance of fifty-five miles. The inns were numerous and comfortable; but highwaymen, mounted and armed, infested the roads, and were often the confederates of the innkeepers. The post-bags were carried on horseback, at the rate of five miles an hour. The first regular post-office was established in 1635, for the more speedy communication of intelligence between England and Scotland.

116. The first English newspaper was printed during the session of the Long Parliament (1641), the Star Chamber having previously put effectual restraints upon the publication of intelligence. Liberty of the press was not enjoyed to any extent until 1695; when, the censorship of the press having been abolished, a number of newspapers were at once issued. They were, of course, very small, the entire sheet containing less matter than is now comprised in a single column of a large daily newspaper. King William and his ministers looked with great distrust upon this unprecedented freedom.

117. During this period, manufacturing industry began to assume that prominence in England which it now possesses. The cotton manufacture was commenced at Manchester, and the art of dying woollen cloth was introduced from Flanders, thus saving the nation vast sums of money. New manufactures were also established in iron, brass, silk, paper, etc. The increase of coinage is said to have amounted to upward of ten millions of pounds. A writer giving an account of this period, remarks, that "in 1688 there were on the 'Change more men worth ten thousand pounds than there were in 1650 worth one thousand; and that gentlewomen, in those earlier times, thought themselves well clothed in a serge gown, in which a chambermaid would, in 1688, be ashamed to be seen; and that besides the great increase of rich clothes, plate, jewels, and household furniture, coaches were in that time augmented a hundredfold."

118. The trade with India and the Levant led to the introduction of many articles of luxury, both in dress and furniture. Carpets, from being used only as covers for tables, came gradually into their present use; although during most of this period rushes or matting constituted the only covering used for floors. The manufacture of oil-cloth was commenced in 1660. The Duke of Buckingham introduced the making of glass from Venice. Prince Rupert, who was a zealous patron both of the useful and the fine arts, invented or improved the method of engraving called mezzotint. The glass bead called Prince Rupert's Drop derives its name from him.

119. The Stuarts were patrons of the fine arts. The value of pictures is said to have doubled in Europe in consequence of the competition of Charles I. and Philip IV. of Spain to obtain them. The distinguished Dutch painters, Van Dyke and Rubens, were invited into England, and received great attention from the Court. Inigo Jones and Sir Christopher Wren, the renowned architects, flourished during this period. The former built the beautiful banqueting-house at Whitehall; the latter is especially celebrated as the designer of St. Paul's. In London alone, fifty-one churches were erected from Wren's designs.

120. The Royal Society for the Promotion of Science was established during the reign of Charles II., and there arose in England a galaxy of great men, distinguished for their researches in every branch of human knowledge. Boyle, by improving the air-pump, was enabled to make many valuable experiments on the nature and properties of the air; Wallis and Hooke made some valuable improvements in optical instruments; Flamsteed and Halley were eminent astronomers—the former noted for the catalogue of stars which he made; the latter as the first to predict the return of a comet. Harvey also announced his famous discovery of the circulation of the blood (1619). Above all, however, towered the sublime genius of Newton, the discoverer of the law of universal gravitation.

121. The number of printing-presses in the kingdom was, however, very small. Books were therefore very scarce and dear; and consequently the booksellers' shops were thronged with readers, as there was a very general taste for the study both of science and literature. There were many distinguished writers besides those already referred to, among whom may be mentioned Sir William Davenant, who succeeded Ben Jonson as Poet Laureate;* Abraham Cowley, who at his death (1667) ranked as the first poet of England, and Robert Herrick, one of the most exquisite of the early English lyric poets. SECTION III.

THE HOUSE OF BRUNSWICK.

Extending from the Accession of George I. (1714) to the present time.

1714 1. George I. was the son of the Duke of Brunswick, Elector of Hanover, and of Sophia, grand-1727 daughter of James I. To this king England seemed always a foreign country, for the people and institutions of which he had very little sympathy or regard. He was fifty-four years of age when he commenced to reign in England, which on his accession became united to Hanover. The Jacobites excited an insurrection in Scotland in order to place on the throne James, the Pretender, who had been promised important aid by Louis XIV. (1715). The death of that monarch, however, disappointed the hopes of James; and he landed in Scotland without men or money.

2. The Earl of Mar held the Highlands with 10,000 clansmen, and the Earl of Derwentwater made an effort to rouse the people of Northumberland in favor of James; but at the first approach of the royal army, under the Duke of Argyle, the Pretender and Mar fled to France, leaving their adherents to their fate. Derwentwater and some others were taken and executed, the estates of many were confiscated, and more than a thousand were banished to North America. A short time afterward a treaty of alliance was entered into between England and France; and, in consequence of it, the Pretender was obliged to seek an asylum elsewhere. He subsequently resided principally at Rome, and soon after contracted a marriage with the daughter of John Sobies'ki, late King of Poland.

3. Through her connection with Hanover, England was embroiled with Sweden and Spain. Certain Danish provinces had been ceded to George, which Charles XII., King of Sweden, claimed as his own; and on his return to his country after his long exile in Turkey, he threatened hostilities unless they were restored. Unable to cope with the English fleet in the Baltic, he entered into a scheme with Cardinal Alberoni, prime-minister of Spain, to place the Pretender on the English throne; and accordingly, the latter visited Madrid and was publicly recognized as King James III. (1719). Charles was to furnish a large army to invade Scotland, and the Spanish fleets were to attack England. The defeat, however, of the Spanish fleet by Admiral Byng, and the death of Charles XII., rendered the whole scheme abortive.

4. One of the most noted occurrences of this reign was the South Sea scheme. This was the project of a corporation, called the South Sea Company, to pay off the national debt, then about £53,000,000, by profitable mercantile enterprises with the Spaniards in South America. The government gave its consent to the scheme, and allowed its stock to be exchanged for the company's stock, which, in consequence of the rage for speculation pervading all classes of the people, reached the extraordinary premium of nine hundred per cent. The bubble, however, soon burst, and occasioned for a time wide-spread embarrassment and ruin (1720). The king and his prime-minister, Lord Stanhope, were charged with having connived at this fraud; and the latter, in the excitement of his vindication before the House of Lords, burst a blood-vessel, and died in a few hours (1721). He was succeeded by Sir Robert Walpole, who continued thereafter to direct the government for more than twenty years.

5. The king was much attached to Hanover, and made frequent visits thither. His death occurred in Germany in 1727. His queen, Sophia Dorothea, had died a few months before, after a captivity of more than thirty years, in a gloomy castle near Hanover, in which she had been imprisoned by her husband on a charge of infidelity.* George I. never gained the regard of his subjects. He was sullen and reserved; and, having but little knowledge of the English language, appeared to great disadvantage in contrast with those who had been trained in the elegant and literary society of the preceding reign. He was succeeded by his son, who was also named George. Sir Isaac Newton, the renowned mathematician, astronomer, and physicist, flourished during this and the three preceding reigns, dying in 1727, at the age of eighty-five. His greatest discovery, that of the law of gravitation, was made during the reign of Charles II.

1727 6. George II. succeeded his father at the age of to forty-four years. Sir Robert Walpole continued to 1760 administer the government, having been retained in office through the friendship of Queen Caroline, whose influence over the king was so great that until her death, in 1737, she may be said to have ruled England. She was remarkable for the grace and dignity of her manners, and her conduct was characterized by kindness of heart, good sense, and propriety. Walpole's administration was one of peace; but his parliamentary tactics depended for success upon bribery and corruption. By bestowing titles of honor, places of profit, or sums of money, he always succeeded in commanding a majority in Parliament.

* George I. was journeying toward Hanover, with his favorite, the Duchess of Kendal, when a letter was thrown into his coach. It was addressed to him by his wife, who in it protested her innocence, upbraided him for his cruel treatment of her, and it is said summoned him to meet her with a year before the divine tribunal. The alarm occasioned by this letter brought on a fit of apoplexy of which he died.

7. A contest with Spain occurred during his administration, brought on by a dispute with respect to the boundary of the American colony Georgia, which had been settled by General Oglethorpe* in 1733, and named after the king; and by the efforts made by Spain to check the trade between England and the Spanish colonies in America, British ships being stopped on the ocean, and searched by the Spaniards. Admiral Vernon, who was sent out with a fleet to attack the Spanish settlements, captured Porto Bello, on the Isthmus of Darien (1739). He afterward attacked Carthagena,† the strongest of these settlements; but, after destroying most of its forts, was compelled to retire (1741). Another squadron, under Commodore Anson,‡ took and destroyed one of the Spanish cities in Peru, and together with other prizes, captured an East India galleon, carrying a cargo valued at £300,000. Anson was engaged in this expedition nearly four years, returning by way of the Cape of Good Hope, thus completing the circumnavigation of the globe (1740-4).

8. Meanwhile, England had become involved in a continental war. On the death of Charles VI., Emperor of Germany (1740), Louis XV., King of France, setting aside the hereditary claims of Maria Theresa (te-re'zah), the emperor's daughter, to the Austrian States, conferred them upon the Elector of Bavaria, who was raised to the imperial throne. The young and beautiful princess, taking refuge among the Hungarians, appeared in their assembly with her infant in her arms; and they answered her appeal by proclaiming her queen, and enthusiastically drew their swords to sustain her cause. England, also supporting the cause of the Austrian princess,* was involved in a war with France. This war is called in history the "War of the Austrian Succession." Sir Robert Walpole, being opposed to the interference of England in this war, resigned his office (1742).

‡ One of the most distinguished of England's naval officers. Besides the exploit referred to, he performed several others which reflected upon him great glory. His services were rewarded by a title, by George II. Lord Anson died in 1762, immensely popular, not only on account of his great achievements, but by reason of his simple manners and arless character. It was jocosely said of him that he had been round the world, but never in it.

9. George II., who had served under Marlborough, joined the allied army of English and Germans, to aid in the defence of the Hungarian queen, and took part in the battle of Dettingen† (det'ting-en), which resulted in the defeat of the French (1743). This was the last occasion on which a king of England has commanded an army in person. The next year an indecisive action was fought between the English fleet, under Admiral Matthews, and the combined French and Spanish fleets, off Toulon. This was followed by a campaign in Flanders, in which the allies (England, Holland, and Austria), under the Duke of Cumberland, second son of George II., were defeated by the French under Marshal Saxe (sax) in the memorable battle of Fontenoy‡ (fon-ta-nwah') (1745.) The operations of the war also extended to the American colonies; and Louisburg, an important French fortress, called from its strength, the "Gibraltar of America," was captured (1745).

10. After the battle of Fontenoy, the English troops were called from the continent to defend their own country against an invasion and rebellion on behalf of the exiled Stuarts. The year previous, the French had collected a fleet which was to aid an army under Marshal Saxe in the invasion of England; but, the fleet having been dispersed in a storm, the attempt was abandoned. Charles Edward, son of the Pretender, however, determined to make an effort to recover the English throne for his father. He sailed for Scotland with a few friends, and landed near Inverness, where he was soon joined by several Highland chieftains with their clans, among whom was the celebrated Cameron of Lochiel (lok-heel'). Having taken Edinburgh and some other of the Scottish towns, he caused his father to be proclaimed King of Scotland under the title of James VIII. (1745).

* This elector of Bavaria was the son of him who had fought against Marlborough, and was thus viewed as an hereditary enemy of England; and, moreover, his success, it was thought by the English statesmen, would imperil the safety of the European states, inasmuch as it would increase the influence of France, and thus destroy the "balance of power."

11. Soon after this he met the royal forces, under Sir John Cope, at Preston Pans, and defeated them with great loss. This alarmed the English; and George II. having hurriedly returned from Hanover, a considerable force was collected, and placed under the Duke of Cumberland, second son of the king. Meanwhile, Charles, after some delay, crossed the border, and marched within one hundred and thirty miles of London, occasioning a very great panic in that city, the king himself preparing for flight. Charles's officers, however, refused to proceed; and he was compelled, though with great reluctance, to retreat. The royal army pursued, and an engagement took place at Culloden, in which the Pretender and his adherents were entirely defeated (1746).

12. This was the last battle fought on the soil of Great Britain, and closed the long struggle made by the Stuarts to regain their lost throne. Charles wandered in disguise through the country for five months; but at last, though his secret was intrusted to several hundred persons, and a reward of £30,000 had been offered for his capture, he succeeded in effecting his escape to France.* Many of those engaged in this rebellion were condemned, and either executed or transported. Among those who suffered death were Lord Lovat,* and some of the other Scottish nobles.

13. A treaty of peace was made with France at Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), by which Maria Theresa's claim to the throne was confirmed; but the war was soon afterward renewed in consequence of disputes respecting the boundary of the French and English possessions in North America. In 1755, General Braddock was defeated by the French in an expedition against Fort du Quesne (doo-kane'), and the survivors owed their escape mainly to the courage and skill of George Washington, then an officer in the Virginia militia. General Johnson gained a victory over the French and Indians at the head of Lake George, Baron Dieskau (de-es-ko'), the French commander, being wounded and taken prisoner. An expedition under Colonel Monckton (monk'tun), the same year, drove the French from Nova Scotia (1755); and Louisburg was taken a second time, after a siege of one month (1758). In 1759, General Wolfe succeeded in reaching the "Plains of Abraham" with his army, and defeated the French forces under the Marquis of Montcalm (mont-kam'). Both generals were killed. Quebec capitulated after this victory, which virtually gave the possession of Canada to the English.

14. Meanwhile, England had taken part in the famous "Seven Years' War," brought on by a coalition of France and several of the other European states against Frederick the Great, of Prussia. England, principally with the object of defending the electorate of Hanover, formed an alliance with the Prussian monarch; and, under the able administration of William Pitt, afterward Earl of Chatham, the government displayed great vigor and enterprise. The want of success, however, of the Duke of Cumberland, enabled the French to overrun Hanover (1757), at which the king was so indignant, that he treated his son with the greatest coldness. Offended at this treatment, the victor of Culloden resigned all his offices, and went into retirement. Hanover was recovered the next year, and important advantages were gained by Frederick.

* Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat, had been for some time a noted character. Selfish and treacherous, he appears to have been actuated only by the desire of aggrandizing himself. In Queen Anne's reign he had engaged in a scheme to gain money by revealing a pretended plot in favor of the exiled Stuarts. In 1715 he joined the government side; and in 1745 he endeavored to play a double game, sending out his clan under the command of his son, while he pretended to support the government.

15. The French having threatened to invade England, Pitt sent an expedition against Cherbourg (sher'burg), which was captured, and a large quantity of ammunition and other stores destroyed. Some of the other French ports were also attacked, but not with the same success (1758). The English fleets, under Admirals Rodney, Boscaw'en, and Hawke, gained some signal victories during the following year; and the army, sent by Pitt into Germany to co-operate with the Prussians, defeated the enemy with great loss in the battle of Minden;* where the victory would have been still more decided had Lord Sackville, who commanded the cavalry, obeyed the instructions given him to charge the routed army. For this failure he was dismissed by Pitt from all his employments (1759).

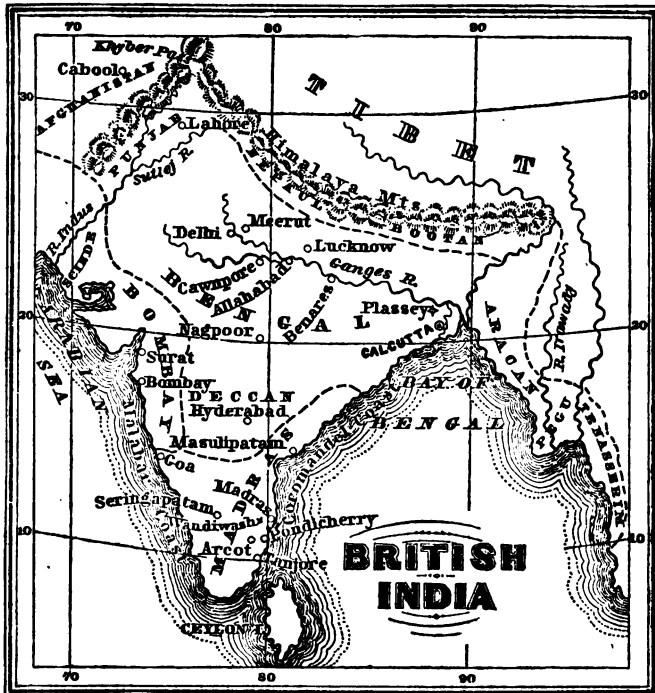

16. These events, combined with the glorious achievements of Wolfe in America, shed a peculiar lustre over the close of this reign. George II. died suddenly the following year at the advanced age of seventy-seven (Oct. 25, 1760). Although, during the whole of his reign, he remained thoroughly German in character, he was by no means as unpopular as his father had been; for his subjects admired his courage, skill, and activity as a soldier, while his good nature was such as to excite their affection and esteem. Hence, with the exception of the partisans of the Stuarts, all were well inclined toward him; and the foreign wars in which he engaged, although not undertaken in the interest of England, were borne by the people with patience. His son Frederick having died some years before (1751), he was succeeded by his grandson George—the first of the Brunswick kings that was a native of England.

English in India. Their first settlements had been compelled to struggle against the jealous opposition of the Portuguese and Dutch; but at this time they had to contend with a more powerful rival—the French. During the war of the Austrian Succession, Fort St. George, at Madras, was captured by the French, but was given back by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. The struggle soon recommenced, the French allying themselves with the native princes against the English. Previous to this time, Au-rung-zêbe', the Great Mogul, who had usurped the imperial power at Delhi (1658), had raised his empire to the highest pitch of splendor and greatness; but under his feeble and dissolute successors it fell rapidly to pieces, and the viceroys of the provinces usurped the power of independent rulers.

18. Of these the Nabob of Arcot, the capital of the Carnatic,* alone remained friendly to the English; and he, being attacked by the French and their Indian allies, was on the point of surrendering, when Robert Clive,† by one of the most daring expeditions recorded in history, restored the influence of his countrymen. With a band of 500 men, most of them Sepoys, or native soldiers, he attacked and took Arcot, a city of 100,000 inhabitants, and subsequently repulsed the French, who made a strong effort to regain its possession (1751). A few years later, when Calcutta had been taken by the nabob Su-ra'jah Dow'lah, and the English prisoners confined and stifed in the garrison

* The Carnatic was one of the old divisions of India, extending one hundred and ten miles along the east coast, and consisting of eight of the present districts of the Presidency of Madras. Its greatest breadth was about one hundred and ten miles.

† Clive was one of the greatest of the warriors and statesmen who took part in the conquest of India. He was at first employed as a clerk in the civil service at Madras, but joyfully abandoned the pen for the sword on the breaking out of the troubles with the French in 1751. On his return to England in 1769, he was made Baron of Plassey, and lived in great splendor on the immense wealth which he had acquired in the East. The East India Company's affairs having become deranged, from the dishonesty and inefficiency of its servants, he was chosen, in 1764, to set them right. This was accomplished within a very brief period; and he again returned to England in 1767. Soon afterwards his conduct was brought under parliamentary censure, and Clive, smarting with the disgrace, committed suicide (Nov. 22, 1774).

prison, called the "Black Hole" (1756),* Clive, with his accustomed energy and dispatch, fitted out an expedition at Madras, and marching to Calcutta, regained possession of the town and the English fort (1757).

19. Assisted by Admiral Watson, he prosecuted the war in Northern India with the utmost vigor and daring; and in the memorable battle of Plassey, completely defeated the native army, 50,000 strong, under Surajah Dowlah, with a force of about 3,000 (June 23, 1757). This splendid victory broke the power of the native princes in Bengal, and gave that province to the English. Three years afterward, another victory was gained by the English under Sir Eyre Coote,† at Wan'di-wash; and Pondicherry (pon-de-she'r'ry), some months later, having been taken from the French, British supremacy was likewise established in the Carnatic (1760). These great achievements were announced in England shortly after the death of George II.

20. During this and the preceding reign, English literature was enriched by the publication of many works of genius. Daniel Defoe wrote his principal work, "Robinson Crusoe" (1719); Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, noted for his eccentricity and the bitterness of his satires, published "Gullivers Travels" (1726) and many other works showing great power and fertility; James Thomson, the poet of nature, gave to the world the "Seasons" (1726-30); Isaac Watts published "Divine Songs for Children;" Bishop Butler wrote the "Analogy of Religion to Nature," a work greatly celebrated for its

* The prisoners, one hundred and forty-six in number, including one woman, were thrust into this dreadful dungeon, only eighteen feet by fourteen, with two small windows, and shut up there during a night of intense heat. The sufferings of these wretched beings, from thirst and suffocation, were terrible; and in the morning only twenty-three remained alive, among whom was the Englishwoman. This dreadful outrage excited universal indignation against the monster by whom it was perpetrated.

† Sir Eyre Coote had served with distinction against the rebels in Scotland, in 1745. He was present at the battle of Plassey, and greatly distinguished himself. He afterward served as commander-in-chief in India, where he died in 1783. A monument was erected to him in Westminster Abbey.

justness of reasoning; and Richard Bentley, the profound classical scholar and critic, published many learned dissertations, with reference to one of which Swift wrote the famous "Battle of the Books." The "Grave," by Robert Blair, is also a noted work of this period, being greatly prized as one of the finest specimens of blank verse of the century.

1760 21. George III.—This prince ascended the throne to at a time of great rejoicing for the glorious victories 1820 gained in North America and India. Wolfe in one, and Clive in the other, had shed the most resplendent lustre on the English arms; but their successes were in great part due to the able administration of the "Great Commoner," as the people were fond of styling the illustrious prime minister, William Pitt. The French being now seriously embarrassed by their defeats, entered into an alliance with Spain, called the Family Compact, since the kings were all of the Bourbon family (1761). Pitt, on learning this, urged an immediate declaration of war against Spain; but being overruled in the council, resigned, and was succeeded by the Earl of Bute, the former tutor and now the especial favorite of the king.

22. In the same year the king married Charlotte, a German princess, of Mecklenburg Strelitz, then only seventeen years of age, but intelligent and amiable. She had won, it is said, the affections of George while Prince of Wales, by a spirited letter which she wrote to Frederick the Great, and in which she besought him to stop the ravages of war then desolating her own and other German states, the people suffering inconceivable miseries from the cruelty of the merciless Prussian soldiery.

with Spain could not be avoided, and was entered into with spirit. Several of the islands of the West Indies were captured, and the city of Havana taken, after a desperate siege. The Philippine Islands were also captured, and many rich Spanish prizes made on the ocean. These successes, however, were of little avail; for Bute, alarmed at the vast increase of the national debt (now amounting to about a million and a quarter sterling), consented to a treaty, which was made at Paris (Feb. 10, 1763), thus terminating the "Seven Years' War." The restoration of Havana and some of the other conquests made this treaty very unpopular; and Bute, frightened by the storm of execration which assailed him, resigned his office, and was succeeded by George Grenville (1763).

24. The statements made by the king in his speech from the throne having been violently attacked in a scurrilous journal styled the "North Briton," and edited by John Wilkes, a member of Parliament, Wilkes was arrested and thrown into the Tower. He was, however, discharged on account of his privilege as a member of Parliament; but at the next session, the Commons decided that the publication was "a false, scandalous, and malicious libel," and ordered it to be burnt by the hangman; and Wilkes himself was expelled from the House by a unanimous vote. Nevertheless, the prosecution was impolitic, Wilkes being supported by the people, on account of their intense dislike of the administration; and subsequently he was again returned to Parliament, and afterward elected Lord Mayor of London.

25. The most impolitic measure of the government was the passage of the celebrated "Stamp Act," for the purpose of raising a revenue by taxing the American colonies (1765). The people of the colonies resisted the measure on the ground that they were not represented in the English Parliament, and "that taxation and representation, by the British constitution, are inseparable." Pitt attacked the measure with great vigor and eloquence; and, Grenville having resigned, the act was repealed (1766). The next year the ministry again attempted to compel the colonies to assist in raising supplies for the English government, imposing a tax upon tea, glass, paper, and painters' colors. A storm of opposition was again excited by this measure; and soon afterward the duties were withdrawn from all articles except tea, which was taxed at the rate of three-pence per pound (1770).

26. This was not satisfactory to the people of the colonies; since they contended not against the amount of taxes imposed but against the principle, which involved the right to tax them to an unlimited extent without their consent. By an arrangement made by the prime minister, Lord North, the East India Company, who had large stores of tea in their warehouses, sent several shiploads to America, to be sold to the colonists on easy terms, but still liable to the duty. This occasioned increased opposition. The tea for New York and Philadelphia was sent back to London, without being landed; in Charleston, it was stored in cellars, where it perished; and in Boston, a party of men, disguised as Indians, boarded the ships, broke open the chests of tea, and emptied their contents into the water (Dec. 1773).

27. In retaliation for this act of bold defiance, the English government passed the Boston Port Bill, by which that port was closed to all commerce, and the seat of the colonial government of Massachusetts was removed to Salem. The people of Salem, unwilling to thrive at the expense of their neighbors, offered the free use of their wharves to the Boston merchants; and Marblehead, fifteen miles distant from the despoiled town, made a similar offer. Other acts, which were considered gross violations of the charters and rightful privileges of the colonies, were also passed by Parliament. Among these was one for quartering the king's troops on the colonists.

28. The resistance which the Americans made to these obnoxious measures was encouraged by many of the leading men in Parliament; among whom were William Pitt, now the Earl of Chatham, Edmund Burke, and Charles Fox. The ministry, however, were determined to reduce the colonies to obedience, and thus was brought on the war of the American Revolution, which commenced at Lexington, Massachusetts (April 19, 1775). This was soon followed by the battle of Bunker Hill (more properly Breed's Hill), in which the American militia, though with great difficulty, were driven from their position, and compelled to retreat (June 17). A few weeks later, George Washington, by appointment from the Colonial Congress, assumed command of the army; and in the month of March following, compelled the British army, under General Howe, to evacuate Boston (1776).

29. The same year the thirteen colonies, through their representatives in Congress, declared their independence (July 4), a short time after which Lord Howe arrived with a fleet off Sandy Hook. He and his brother, General Howe, had been commissioned to grant pardons to all who would lay down their arms and return to their allegiance; and, accordingly, they issued a proclamation to the people to that effect, and sent letters to Washington. The latter, however, were not received, as they were addressed to "G. Washington Esq," thus avoiding any recognition of his position as General. Previously to this, the British government had sent over a large body of German troops, hired from the Landgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Brunswick, and other petty German sovereigns.

30. A series of disastrous defeats to the Americans followed, and the cities of New York and Philadelphia fell successively into the hands of the British; but General Burgoyne, invading the states of Canada, was effectually checked at Saratoga by the Americans under General Gates, and compelled to surrender his entire army (Oct. 17, 1777). This important victory secured for the states the alliance and aid of France, as well as the acknowledgment of their independence by that power (1778). The war, however, continued for several years, until the British army under Cornwallis having surrendered at Yorktown to the combined forces of the Americans and French (Oct. 19, 1781), the English government could no longer withstand the demands of the people, that no further attempt should be made to reduce the insurgent colonies.

31. A preliminary treaty was soon afterward made, acknowledging their independence (Nov. 30, 1782), and this was definitively signed at Paris (Sept. 3, 1783). By the terms of this treaty, the northern boundary of the United States was fixed at the Great Lakes, and the western at the Mississippi river; and an unlimited right of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland was conceded. The first minister from the new republic, Mr. Adams, was received by the king with great affability and kindness (1785), the monarch remarking that, though he had been the last to consent to the separation of the colonies, he would be the first to welcome the United States as an independent power.

them, predicting that it would lead to their separation from the mother country. When, therefore, after the surrender of Burgoyne, a motion was made in the House of Lords to obtain peace at any price, though suffering from extreme illness, he rose from his bed, and, going to the House, protested, with his usual vehement eloquence, against the dismemberment of the empire. On rising to reply to some remarks in opposition to his views, he fell back in convulsions, and was carried insensible from the house. Four days afterward he expired (1778).

33. It was not with her colonies alone that England had carried on war. The acknowledgment of their independence by France led to a war with that country; and this was soon followed by hostilities with Spain (1779) and Holland (1780), which powers were joined, in what was called the "armed neutrality," by Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. Thus all the most powerful nations of Europe arrayed themselves against Great Britain; but the latter, by means of her powerful fleets, succeeded in thwarting their hostile designs. The Spaniards made an attack on Gibraltar, but were repulsed, after a three years' siege, with severe loss; the Dutch suffered greatly by the destruction of their commerce; and the French fleet was totally defeated by Rodney, after it had aided in compelling the surrender of Cornwallis (April, 1782). A small squadron of French and American vessels, under the famous John Paul Jones,* had, however, gained a splendid victory over two British frigates near the coast of Scotland (1779).

34. During the American war important advantages had been gained by the British in India, under Warren Hast-

When the American Revolution broke out, he was in Virginia, and soon after entered the American service. His name was John Paul, to which, for some reason, he added Jones. After the Revolution, he entered the Russian naval service, and took an active part in the Turkish war. He died at Paris in 1792.

ings, by whom, with the aid of the veteran warrior, Sir Eyre Coote, Hyder Ali (ah'le), the most energetic of the native princes, had been repulsed in several attacks on the Carnatic. The measures, however, which Hastings adopted to obtain money, in order to make the large remittances expected by the East India Company, were characterized by great oppression and injustice toward the native princes and their subjects. Accordingly, after his return to England, articles of impeachment were presented against him in Parliament by the celebrated Edmund Burke (1788).

35. His trial, in Westminster Hall, is one of the most memorable mentioned in history. It commenced in 1788, and lasted till 1795, resulting in the acquittal of Hastings, who complained that his arraignment had occurred in one generation, and that the judgment was not pronounced till the next. This trial was not only remarkable for its length, but for the brilliant talents and eloquence displayed by the managers of the impeachment, among whom were Burke, Sheridan, Fox, and Windham,—a galaxy of distinguished men unsurpassed for splendor of genius in the annals of any country.

36. During this period, the premiership had been held by William Pitt, son of the Earl of Chatham, to whom, although only twenty-four years of age, it was given in 1783, and who continued to govern the country during eighteen years, a much longer period than any minister since Walpole. When he commenced his administration, the people were discontented, and the treasury exhausted by the long and expensive wars just brought to a close; but, by his consummate ability, confidence was soon restored, and in a few years the finances of the country were so much improved that ten millions of the national debt had been paid off. An event, however, occurred that baffled his far-seeing calculations, and convulsed all Europe. This was the breaking out of the great French Revolution (1789).

37. At first, the revolutionists in France received considerable sympathy in their efforts to obtain for the people a proper share in the government, and to abolish the dreadful system of oppression and misrule under which France had for centuries groaned in misery; but their excesses soon disgusted and alarmed every civilized nation in Europe. After the execution of the French king, Louis XVI., in 1793, Great Britain, Holland, Russia, and Spain formed a coalition to restore the monarchy in France, and thus prevent the spread of republican principles into other countries, the French Convention having voted that they would give assistance to every nation that wished to "recover its liberty."

38. Against this formidable combination, the revolutionary government showed the most extraordinary vigor and activity. In a short time they sent eight armies into the field, and successfully baffled the most strenuous efforts of their enemies. The English fleets, under Lord Howe, Admiral Duncan, and Lord Nelson, gained, however, several brilliant victories. During this struggle, Napoleon Bonaparte carved his way to fame and fortune. After defeating the Austrians in Italy in two brilliant campaigns, he induced the French government, then administered by the "Directory," to consent to an expedition designed to conquer Egypt, as a means of attacking the commerce and power of England in the East (1798).

39. Landing there with an immense army, he captured Alexandria, and then marched toward Cairo (ki'ro), which, after defeating the Mamelukes in the noted "Battle of the Pyramids," he entered (1798). This gave him possession of the country; but a few days afterward Nelson destroyed the French fleet in the memorable "Battle of the Nile,"* and thus cut off the retreat of the invaders. Of all the ships that had carried Bonaparte's army to Egypt, only four escaped to carry the news of the disaster to France. Nelson displayed all his characteristic gallantry and skill, and was severely wounded in the action. He was rewarded by a liberal annuity, and the title of Baron Nelson of the Nile.

40. In consequence of the invasion of Egypt, the Turkish sultan declared war against France; and Napoleon, therefore, leaving Egypt in charge of one of his generals, undertook an expedition into Syria. Several towns; one after the other, yielded to his arms, among them Jaffa, where he caused a large number of the Turkish prisoners to be massacred. At Acre, he found the Sultan's fleet under the command of Sir Sydney Smith, an English officer; and after a siege of nearly two months, was compelled to retreat (1799). Having returned to Egypt, he went on board a French man-of-war in the night, and accompanied by some of his best generals, the others being left with the army, succeeded in escaping the English cruisers, and arrived safely in France. A change in the government took place soon afterward, and Bonaparte assumed its control under the title of First Consul.

41. Meanwhile, the revolutionary spirit had spread to Ireland, and excited a determination on the part of the people there to regain the independence of which they had so long been deprived by the English, whose yoke had been galling in the extreme, especially to the Irish peasantry. Left to the mercies of the agents appointed by their foreign lords, this wretched people suffered every species of insult and oppression, to which was also added the bitterness of religious persecution. The "Society of United Irishmen" was formed in 1791, and declared its objects to be a reform of the legislature according to the principles of civil, political, and religious liberty. It consisted of Protestants as well as Catholics; although the majority of Irish Protestants, called "Orangemen," opposed these views, and favored a continuance of the English rule.

42. Two expeditions sent by France to assist the Irish patriots were destroyed; but a formidable insurrection broke out soon afterward, the number in arms being estimated at 250,000 (1798). Numerous engagements occurred in various quarters, but generally to the disadvantage of the insurgents, who were finally compelled to submit to the government (1800). It was then proposed to unite the two countries under one parliament, and although the measure was violently opposed by many, among whom were Grattan and Curran, the most eloquent of the Irish orators, the bill for the union, which had passed the English legislature, was accepted by the Parliament of Ireland (1801).* Thereafter, the kingdom assumed the title of the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

43. Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who had been sent to Egypt, gained an important victory over the French forces which had been left by Napoleon in that country as a standing menace to the power of Great Britain (1801). Abercrombie was mortally wounded in the action; but his successor, General Hutchinson, having formed a union with the Turks, captured Cairo and Alexandria, the French surrendering with the agreement that they should be carried back to France at the expense of the allied powers. The French savans were only permitted to retain their own manuscripts and private papers, all the scientific collections which they had made for the French republic being surrendered to the victors. Among the latter was the famous Rosetta stone, so useful afterward in furnishing a basis for deciphering the hieroglyphics on the Egyptian monuments.

44. Meanwhile, the northern powers—Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, had formed a league to protect their commerce against the British, who claimed the right of searching the vessels of neutral nations; and being soon joined by Prussia, they commenced acts of hostility against Great Britain. Accordingly, a fleet under Sir Hyde Parker and Lord Nelson, was sent to the Baltic, and in an action that ensued off Copenhagen, the Danish fleet, principally through the desperate valor of Nelson,* was destroyed. This had the effect to detach Denmark from the league; and the Emperor Paul being, about the same time, assassinated, Alexander, his successor, resolved on a policy friendly to the British (1801). Shortly afterward, a treaty was signed by Great Britain and the northern powers, by which the rights of neutral navigation were satisfactorily adjusted. These events were soon followed by the treaty of Amiens (am'-e-enz), by which peace was concluded between France and England (1802).

45. For some time after the legislative union of Ireland and England, considerable discontent existed in the former country; and in 1803 an insurrection was attempted in Dublin, but was immediately suppressed. It was for his connection with this affair that the talented but ill-fated Robert Emmet suffered death. Pitt had before this desired

* In the thickest of the fight some of the largest of the English vessels got aground on the shoals, and the Admiral gave the signal to withdraw; but Nelson, pretending that he did not see it, continued the fight. that the Catholic disabilities should be abolished, in order to make the Union more complete and satisfactory; and as the king refused to give his assent, he resigned, and was succeeded by Henry Addington, who had long been speaker of the House of Commons (1802).

46. The peace of Amiens proved only a brief truce; for the very next year after its conclusion, the First Consul assumed a threatening attitude toward England, and publicly insulted her ambassador. War was accordingly resumed, and immense preparations were made in France to invade England; but they were entirely frustrated by the British cruisers which swept the Channel, and bombarded some of the French ports. Pitt, yielding to the call of the public, now resumed the direction of affairs, and the war was carried on with great activity. Nelson gained his most brilliant victory, entirely defeating the combined French and Spanish fleets off Cape Trafalgar; but at a heavy cost to his country, for he fell mortally wounded in the action (1805). He was buried with more than kingly honors in St. Paul's Cathedral, and the whole nation mourned his loss.

47. Napoleon, in 1804, became Emperor of France, and the next year caused himself to be crowned King of Italy, with the famous "iron crown" of the Lombards. These assumptions of power led to a coalition against him, consisting of England, Austria, Russia, Sweden, and Prussia; but, with his characteristic daring and promptitude, he marched against the Austrians, and succeeded in capturing a large army at Ulm (1805); and shortly afterward routed the combined army of Austria and Russia at Austerlitz with overwhelming loss. This was soon followed by the sanguinary battle of Jena, in which he gained so decisive a victory over the Prussians, that he immediately entered Berlin in triumph, and dictated terms to the conquered monarch (1806).

48. The year 1806 is memorable for the death of the two great statesmen Pitt and Fox. The former was only forty-six years of age, having been brought to a premature grave by the excessive toils and anxieties of his great office. At Berlin, Napoleon issued the famous decree declaring the British Isles in a state of blockade, and forbidding all commercial intercourse on the part of any nation with Great Britain or her colonies. After the severe battles of Eylau (i'low) and Fried'and, he was enabled to dictate terms to the Russian Emperor at Tilsit, and was thus left free to prosecute more effectually hostilities against the British. The latter fearing that he would take possession of the navy of Denmark, which was considerable, sent a powerful force under Sir Arthur Wellesley* and Admiral Gambier to Copenhagen to demand that it should be given up; and, this being refused, the city was bombarded and captured; and the whole Danish fleet, with an immense quantity of naval stores, was carried to England.

49. Napoleon's commercial restrictions, as declared in the Berlin decree, were not obeyed by Portugal, into which country British merchandise was freely admitted, and thence transported into Spain. A French army was therefore ordered to invade the country; and, Lisbon having been captured, the prince-regent took refuge in the British fleet then in the Tagus river, and, sailing to Brazil, fixed the seat of his government in that country (1807). Portugal was then declared by Napoleon a province of the French empire. Not content with this usurpation, he next seized the throne of Spain, and arbitrarily placed upon it his brother, Joseph Bonaparte (1808).

* Sir Arthur Wellesley, afterward the Duke of Wellington, had previous to this acquired very great distinction by his skill and bravery in India.

48. Why is the year 1806 memorable? What is said of Pitt? What decree did Napoleon issue? Treaty of Tilsit? Taking of Copenhagen and the Danish fleet?

49. Why was Portugal invaded by the French? The result? What course did Napoleon pursue toward Spain?

50. These events led to the "Peninsular War," the British government being determined to prevent the consummation of Napoleon's ambitious schemes, which, by disturbing the "balance of power" in Europe, threatened the safety and independence of every one of its nations. Accordingly, Sir Arthur Wellesley was sent to Portugal with an army to assist the people, who had risen in insurrection against the French invaders. At Vimeira (ve-ma'e-rah) he gained a decided victory; but it was not improved in consequence of a change of commanders, the English, by the convention of Cintra, agreeing to retire from the country. Sir John Moore, who was ordered to co-operate with the Spaniards against the French, was driven into retreat by Napoleon, receiving no support from the inhabitants. He afterward fell in the battle of Corun'na, where the French, under Soult, were repulsed; and the English troops, after having suffered inconceivable hardships, made their escape from the country with the assistance of the fleet (1809).*

51. Notwithstanding these reverses, the British government, now under the administration of the celebrated George Canning, determined to prosecute the war in the Peninsula with vigor. The chief command was given to Sir Arthur Wellesley, who, after entering Portugal and driving the French into Spain, passed into the latter country and formed a junction with the general of the Spanish army, then about 30,000 strong, but in bad condition. An attack of the French at Talave'ra brought on a terrific battle, in which the British fought with desperate valor,

* It was with reference to this event that Wolfe's well-known poem was written, commencing with the verse,

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried;
Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot
O'er the grave where our hero was buried.

50. What war did this lead to? Who was sent to Portugal? Battle of Vimeira? Sir John Moore?

and compelled the French to retreat. Wellesley received the title of Viscount Wellington as a reward for this splendid victory. He was, however, compelled to retire into Portugal, before the immense armies which Napoleon poured into Spain, and by which, before the end of the year, he made himself master of the whole country (1809).

52. Meanwhile, hostilities were resumed on the part of Austria, with armies which amounted, in the aggregate, to about 500,000 men. Napoleon, however, notwithstanding his inferior forces, and the numerous operations which he was obliged simultaneously to carry on, was almost everywhere victorious. At Eck'muhl, he defeated the Archduke Charles, but was compelled to fall back from his position at Aspern. A week afterward he gained a decisive victory at Wagram (wah'gram); after which the Austrian emperor was obliged to submit to such terms of peace as the victor chose to dictate (1809).

53. Austria being thus helpless at his feet, Napoleon sent additional forces into Spain and Portugal, determined to drive the British out of the latter country, and to crush the Spaniards, who still kept up a vigorous opposition to the invaders; but chiefly by irregular troops, called Guerillas. In the Battle of Busa'co, Wellington repulsed the French General Masse'na with heavy loss; then, retreating to the heights of Tor'res Ve'dras, some distance north of Lisbon, he took up a position which Massena did not dare to attack, but retired into winter quarters (1810). In this year, George III. having become insane, the Prince of Wales was made Regent.

54. During the next year, warlike operations went on in Spain and Portugal under Wellington, opposed by Massena; but the latter was so unsuccessful, that Napoleon superseded him, and appointed General Marmont in his place. In 1812, Wellington defeated that officer with immense loss at Salamanca, and marching on Madrid captured the city, together with a vast quantity of military stores. In this year commenced the war with the United States, brought on by the unjust claims of Great Britain to the right of searching American vessels for deserters and other British seamen, in order that she might seize and impress them into her service. The war commenced with great disasters to the Americans on land; but on the ocean the brilliant victories achieved by Captain Hull, Commodore Decatur, and others, retrieved the honor of their country.

55. In 1813, Wellington, now Commander-in-chief of the Spanish as well as the British forces, attacked the French at Vittoria, and drove them from the town, capturing the whole of their artillery and ammunition, together with other property valued at a million sterling (June 21). They continued their retreat, followed by the allies, as far as the passes of the Pyrenees, where Marshal Soult, sent by Napoleon to defend the French frontier, was repulsed in a series of engagements called the "Battles of the Pyrenees." Wellington crossed into France, forcing every position assumed by Soult; and the next year reached Toulouse, where he again attacked the French, and compelled them to retreat (April, 1814).

56. Meanwhile, Napoleon, defeated in the Russian expedition (1812), and subsequently at the great battle of Leipsic (1813), had been driven into disastrous retreat before the vast army of the allied powers; and, finally, finding himself unable to make further resistance, had consented to abdicate the French throne, and retire to the little island of Elba (1814). The forces of the allies entered Paris, and the crown of France was conferred upon Louis XVIII.

The American war was continued during 1813 and 1814; but the British gained no permanent advantage, and in the latter year peace was made by the treaty of Ghent (Dec. 24). Before, however, this was known in America, a fine army under General Pakenham (pak'n-am) made an attack upon New Orleans, but was repulsed by a force under General Jackson, the British general and two thousand of his soldiers being slain (Jan. 8, 1815).

57. As a reward for his brilliant conduct in the Peninsular war, Wellington was made a duke, and publicly thanked by both Houses of Parliament, also receiving a grant of £400,000. Toward the close of 1814, a Congress of representatives of the European powers met at Vienna, to arrange and settle the affairs of Europe, which had become greatly confused by the many revolutions caused by these long wars. While in session they were suddenly surprised by the departure of Napoleon from Elba. Landing at Cannes (kan), on the southern shore of France, he was enthusiastically welcomed by the troops; and entering Paris was greeted with the joyful acclamations of all classes (March 20, 1815). Louis XVIII. having fled, Napoleon found himself once more on the throne, and in less than two months was enabled to organize an army of 200,000 men.

58. This daring disregard of the treaty of the previous year alarmed all Europe, and a combination of the principal powers was immediately formed once more to dethrone the French Emperor. Great Britain entered into it with spirit and vigor, the Parliament voting nearly one hundred millions sterling to carry on the war. The Duke of Wellington, at the head of an immense army, proceeded to Belgium, whither also the Prussians, under Blucher (blu'ker), were marching to oppose Napoleon, who had crossed the frontier with 100,000 infantry and 25,000 cavalry. At the same time Austria and Russia were preparing to invade France with overwhelming armies.

59. The plan of Wellington was to form a junction with Blucher and march on Paris; but Napoleon, in order to prevent this, at once attacked the Prussians at Ligny (leen'ye),* drove them from their position, and sent Grouchy (groo'she) in pursuit with 35,000 men, to cut off their union with the British, who lay then at Brussels. Wellington at once advanced and took up his position at Waterloo, where he was attacked with the most desperate impetuosity by the French forces (June 18). Charge after charge was made, and at last even by the Old Guard,—the unconquered veterans of Austerlitz and Jena, but without effect. Meanwhile Blucher had out-marched Grouchy, and just as Napoleon's last great charge was being made, appeared on the field. The French columns, panic-stricken, broke and fled; and the great battle of Waterloo was ended.

60. A second abdication of Napoleon followed; and finding no means of escape from France, he surrendered himself to the commander of a British vessel of war at Rochefort, and was carried to England. By agreement of the allied sovereigns, he was sent to the little island of St. Helena, where, after an imprisonment of six years, he died. This final overthrow of Napoleon ended the great struggle which for nearly twenty-five years had been made by Great Britain, to check the conquests of the French, and preserve the "balance of power" in Europe. To accomplish this end immense sacrifices of men and money had been made, the national debt having been increased to nearly nine hundred millions of pounds.

59. What was Wellington's plan? Napoleon's attack? Its result? The battle of Waterloo and its consequences?

60. What course did Napoleon then take? His fate? What is said of the war and its effects on England?

61. The sudden change to peace, after this long war, produced great distress among the people. Trade languished, a multitude of persons were thrown out of employment, and the vast number of soldiers and sailors who had been discharged greatly augmented the difficulty. To add to the people's distress bread became very dear, in consequence of the scarcity of wheat caused by unfavorable seasons and the corn laws, which prevented its importation. Riots ensued, particularly in the manufacturing districts, where by the improvement of labor-saving machinery very many persons were deprived of their ordinary employments; and these wreaked their vengeance by the destruction of the newly-invented machines for spinning and weaving.

62. To these causes of tumult was added the agitation of the question of parliamentary reform, and large meetings of the people were held to demand annual parliaments and universal suffrage. One of these, at Manchester, called by Henry Hunt, a celebrated popular orator, was dispersed by the authorities, several persons being killed (1819). Prominent among those who advocated the introduction of liberal reforms in the government was the celebrated William Cobbett,* who, in a periodical entitled the "Political Register," boldly and ably advocated the cause of the laboring classes. For this he was repeatedly prosecuted by the government on a charge of libel, and was fined and imprisoned.

63. George III. died in 1820, after a reign of sixty years, —the longest in English history; during the latter part of

* William Cobbett, one of the most extraordinary men of his age, was born in very humble life, in 1762. In his earlier years he served as a soldier in Nova Scotia; but afterward settled in Philadelphia, where he wrote the celebrated papers which appeared under the name of "Peter Porcupine." The first number of the "Political Register" appeared in England in 1802, he having removed to that country. Toward the close of his life he was a member of Parliament. He died in 1835. Few writers have excelled him in vigor of thought and homely clearness of style, and very few have rendered a more lasting service to the cause of liberal government and freedom of discussion.

it he had lived in entire seclusion. His private character, in every relation of life, was worthy of esteem; and his kindness of disposition and homely familiarity endeared him to the great body of the English people, by whom he was regarded with sincere affection, being in his latter years generally spoken of as "the good old king." As a monarch, his moderate abilities, narrow views, and obstinate adherence to obsolete principles and time-honored abuses, have subjected his name to considerable obloquy, if not contempt. He had twelve children, of whom the oldest was George, the prince-regent, who now succeeded him. His faithful and excellent queen, Charlotte, had died a short time previously.

STATE OF SOCIETY UNDER THE FIRST THREE BRUNSWICK KINGS.

64. During this period, extending from 1714 to 1820, and therefore nearly coincident with the eighteenth century, the British government assumed a more settled character; and, as the people advanced in intelligence, became more and more dependent upon their wishes. Hence the king ruled through his ministers, who were able to continue in office only as long as they succeeded in retaining the support of Parliament. The power exercised by the sovereign has ever since been very limited, solely depending upon his intelligence, force of character, and moral worth; and all the agencies of government have become more and more under the control of public opinion,—the great ruling power of every truly civilized nation. The popular agitations, riots, etc., to secure parliamentary reform, and a more general and equitable representation in the House of Commons, indicate the efforts which this power was exerting toward the close of this period to assert its supremacy.

64. Change in the government? Power of the sovereign? Influence of public opinion?

65. This ardent desire for freedom, which so strikingly characterized the public mind in England, was, in the first place, the result of the American war for independence, with its successful issue. The great questions which sprung up during this struggle, and which gave occasion to the magnificent displays of parliamentary eloquence of Burke, Fox, Sheridan, and others, shattered to pieces the old theories of arbitrary government, and imbued the popular mind with democratic notions and principles. The French revolution—the mightiest political and social tornado the world has ever seen—shook every institution that had hitherto been held sacred, and threatened, at one time, to resolve human society into its original elements. Hence arose, in England, a new party called “Radical Reformers,” or “Radicals,” whose principles were ably advocated by Paine,* Cobbett, and others; and hence also the spread of infidelity among the middle classes, fostered by such writings as Paine’s “Age of Reason.”

66. During the first part of this period, religion was at a very low ebb among all classes. The clergy, often ordained without any regard to their intellectual and spiritual attainments, but simply as a provision for the younger sons of aristocratic families, neglected the duties of their sacred calling to indulge in fox-hunting, gaming, and the pleasures of the table. The preaching of

* Thomas Paine, famous for his connection with the American and French revolutions and for his advocacy of infidel opinions, was born in 1737, and was by trade a stay-maker. In 1774 he emigrated to America, and advocated the cause of the colonies in a series of papers entitled “Common Sense,” the publication of which gained him the friendship of Washington, Franklin, and other distinguished American patriots. This was soon followed by the “American Crisis,” in eighteen numbers, published at different times (1776-83),—a work that exercised a powerful effect upon the public mind, in keeping up the spirit of patriotism and freedom. Subsequently he published in England his most famous work, the “Rights of Man,” for which he was prosecuted by the government, and found guilty of “a false, scandalous, and malicious libel.” Escaping to France, he became a member of the revolutionary convention, and during the “reign of terror” under Robespierre was thrown into prison. His religious writings, which have given him an infamous notoriety, were published afterward. He died in the United States in 1806, the victim of his own principles; for he became licentious, intemperate, and irascible,—a terror to his household, and a dreadful example to the world of what a wreck a man of truly great parts may become when he divests himself of religious restraint and the hope of immortality.

65. Effects of the American revolution? Of the French revolution? The “Radicals”? By whom were their principles advocated?

66. State of religion? The clergy? Effect of the preaching of George Whitefield and John Wesley? What is said of the Methodists? Watts, Doddridge, etc.? Sunday-schools?

George Whitefield* and John Wesley † did much to infuse into the public mind a higher regard for spiritual matters. The religious society which they founded received, at first as a nickname, the appellation of "Methodists," from the strictness of their religious principles and observances. It rapidly gathered within its ranks vast multitudes, particularly of the middle and lower orders of the people. The writings of Watts, Doddridge, and others also contributed to raise the religious tone of society. Sunday-schools were founded about the close of 1781 by Robert Raikes.

67. It was, however, some time before there was infused into the public mind a spirit of religious toleration. In 1778, was passed the "Catholic Relief Bill," freeing Catholics from the severe disabilities to which they had long been subjected. This measure had the effect to excite the animosities of the ignorant and bigoted of the population; and a movement was undertaken in opposition to it, led by Lord George Gordon, a crazy nobleman, who made many silly and violent speeches in the House of Commons on the subject. By means of the inflammatory addresses made by him and others, and the outcry which was raised of "No Popery," dreadful riots were excited, in which many Catholic churches and other buildings were destroyed. Lord Mansfield's fine mansion, containing his valuable law library, fell a sacrifice to the senseless fury of the mob, which for several days had entire possession of London. Nearly five hundred persons were killed or wounded.

* George Whitefield was particularly celebrated for the fervid eloquence with which he preached to the people. He was ordained a minister of the Church of England, but subsequently joined Wesley and the Methodists. He spent part of his life in America, where he died while on a visit to the churches in New England (1770).

† John Wesley, the celebrated founder of Methodism, was an ordained minister of the Church of England, but soon became disgusted with the coldness and want of spirituality which prevailed among both clergy and laity. Like Whitefield, he was a powerful popular preacher, and like him also, he preached to the people of both hemispheres, residing some years in the colonies. For more than half a century he exercised the most complete authority over his numerous followers both in England and America. He died in 1791 at the age of eighty-eight. It is estimated that at his death there were 71,000 Methodists in England, and 48,000 in America. His influence was exerted chiefly among the lower orders, while the efforts of Whitefield, aided by the Countess of Huntingdon, awakened a religious interest among the higher classes of society.

67. Religious toleration? The Catholic Relief Bill? Effect of its passage? The Gordon riots?

68. In commerce and navigation vast and rapid strides were taken. The trade with the American colonies had become very considerable previous to their independence; but with the States it was much more extensive, the principal imports from them being tobacco, rice, and cotton. The importation of the last-mentioned article from America commenced in 1770, the first shipment being about 2,000 pounds. At the close of the period, the annual import amounted to 120,000,000 pounds. The same product was also imported from Brazil and the East Indies. The English West Indies exported large quantities of sugar, together with mahogany and logwood. The gradual introduction of steam navigation was a marked feature of the period. Experiments with the view to this application of the steam-engine had been early made; but it was not until nearly the end of the period that serviceable steam-vessels were constructed. In 1820 a line of steam-packets was established to ply between Holyhead and Dublin.*

69. The improvements in the methods and implements of agriculture were also very great, with, of course, a large increase in the quantity and variety of the vegetable products. The cultivation of the potato, introduced during the seventeenth century, did not become general until about the middle of the eighteenth. Philanthropists encouraged it with the view to prevent famine among the lower classes by affording a substitute for grain during seasons of bad harvests. Greenhouses for the cultivation of tropical plants also began to be constructed, and soon came into general use.

* Robert Fulton, an American, in 1807, made the first successful voyage by steam from New York to Albany, in a steamboat called the Clermont. Five years later a steamboat was started on the Clyde by Henry Bell, a former associate of Fulton; and thus was commenced steam navigation in Great Britain.

70. In the industrial arts, the improvements introduced during this period were very numerous and valuable. Previous to 1718, England was entirely dependent upon foreigners for silk thread; but in that year a large mill was erected at Derby for its manufacture, by Mr. Lombe, who had gone to Italy in the disguise of a common workman, and taken drawings of the silk-throwing machinery in use in that country. Immense quantities of organzine* thread were thereafter produced. The cotton manufacture now took precedence of that of wool, which previously had been the chief material of English fabrics. This change was largely due to the carding-machine and the spinning-jenny invented by James Hargreaves,† but principally to the invention of the spinning-frame by Sir Richard Arkwright.‡ In 1771, Arkwright erected a large factory which was worked by water power.

71. The iron manufacture became very extensive during this period, especially at Birmingham; and large quantities of cutlery were manufactured at Sheffield. The number of workmen employed in the former city alone, in 1770, was estimated at fifty thousand. To all these branches of manufacturing industry a wonderful impulse had been given by the application of steam. James Watt|| made his celebrated invention of the condensing steam-engine in

* That is, thread made like rope by twisting several strands into one thread.

† James Hargreaves was an illiterate artisan, supporting himself and family by spinning. In 1760 he invented the carding-machine as a substitute for carding by hand. The spinning-jenny, by which he was enabled to spin a large number of threads at the same time, was invented by accident in 1764. He died in 1768.

‡ Richard Arkwright, born in 1732, was originally a barber. In 1767 he devoted himself to making improvements in cotton-spinning; and the next year produced the spinning-frame, which consisted chiefly of two pairs of rollers, the first pair moving slowly in contact, and passing the cotton to the other pair, which revolved with such increased velocity as to draw out the thread to the required degree of fineness. He was at first very poor, and incurred the displeasure of the artisans by his labor-saving machines. He however rapidly rose to opulence and fame, and received in 1786 the honor of knighthood from George III. At his death, in 1792, his property amounted to more than half a million sterling.

|| James Watt was born in Scotland in 1736. He was first a mathematical instrument maker, and subsequently a surveyor. He began his experiments on the steam-engine about 1763, and soon discovered the cause of the inefficiency of that in general use at the time. This was worked by atmospheric pressure, steam being used only to produce a vacuum. In 1765 he hit upon the idea of a separate condenser, and of using steam as the motive power; and in 1769 his model was completed. Other improvements followed. He made numerous inventions unconnected with the steam-engine. He died in 1819.

1769, and introduced during the next sixteen years, improvements in it of great practical value. The working of the coal mines was greatly facilitated by the application of Watt's invention. The inventions of Wedgwood* also made so many improvements in pottery, that he may be considered the founder of this branch of manufacture in Great Britain. His first success was the production of a beautiful cream-colored porcelain, called, in honor of Queen Charlotte, who greatly admired it, "Queen's Ware" (1763).

72. Through the sagacity, energy, and liberality of the Duke of Bridgewater, and his celebrated engineer, James Brindley, canal navigation assumed considerable importance in England. An act of parliament for the construction of his first canal was obtained in 1758. The roads, too, gradually improved; and during the greater part of the period travellers were conveyed by means of rapid stage-coaches to the various parts of the kingdom. The construction of the first locomotive, or steam-carriage, in 1804, commenced a wonderful revolution in this respect; railways had been used to a limited extent some time previously. Locomotive power was employed on a railway by George Stephenson† in 1814; but it was not until 1821 that passengers were transported in this way.

73. The fine arts were also cultivated with great success. Among painters the most prominent were Hogarth‡ and Sir Joshua Reynolds.¶ The latter was the first president of

* Joshua Wedgwood, born in 1730, was early engaged in the business of pottery. His many improvements in the manufacture of all kinds of porcelain realized him a vast fortune. He was a man of benevolence and culture; and besides his own special kind of knowledge, studied natural philosophy with much success. He died in 1795.

† George Stephenson, at first a workman in a colliery, rose to great distinction by his singular genius as a machinist and engineer. Through his efforts the locomotive became a success, the first railroads being constructed under his supervision. He died in 1848, at the age of 67.

‡ William Hogarth was born in London 1697. His first employment as an artist was in engraving. His moral paintings attracted considerable attention from their humor as well as artistic excellence. The most celebrated of his paintings is, perhaps, the "Enraged Musician," which was finished in 1741. He died in 1764.

¶ Sir Joshua Reynolds, generally placed at the head of the English school of painting, was born in England in 1724. His portraits were of unsurpassed merit, eclipsing every thing that had been executed since the time of Van Dyck. He was the companion and friend of Johnson, Burke, Goldsmith, Garrick, the famous actor, and other literary men of the time. He died in 1784.

72. Canal navigation, by whom encouraged? Travelling? The introduction of the locomotive? Railways?

73. Cultivation of the fine arts? Eminent painters? Of what was Reynolds the founder? Handel's achievements in music? The "Beggars' Opera?" Other musical composers?

the Royal Academy of Arts, founded in 1768. George III. was a generous patron of the fine arts, and conferred on Reynolds the honor of knighthood. In music, Handel,* by birth a German, achieved an enduring renown. The first oratorio was produced by him in 1733; but it was not until 1749 that his sublimest composition, "The Messiah," appeared. Very many operas were also composed and brought out by him. One of the most successful works of this kind was the "Beggars' Opera," composed by the poet Gay,† to whom it was suggested by Swift in 1726. Among other musical composers of this period were the celebrated Dr. Arne,‡ and Dr. Charles Burney,§ the latter distinguished particularly as the author of the "General History of Music."

74. The progress in scientific discovery was also quite remarkable. Sir Humphrey Davy,|| the great chemist, invented the safety-lamp (1816), one of the most valuable presents ever made by science to humanity. Sir William Herschel¶ discovered in 1781 a new planet, to which he gave the name Georgium Sidus, in honor of George III., now generally called Uranus. He also made many other valuable discoveries in astronomy. His monster telescope, forty feet

* George Frederick Handel was born in Saxony in 1684. At the age of fourteen, he produced his first opera at Hamburgh. He went to England in 1710, and soon became exceedingly popular. A liberal pension was settled on him by George I., and his oratorios were frequently attended by the king and the royal family. He died in 1759, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a handsome monument was erected to his memory.

† John Gay, the friend of Swift and Pope, and the author of several interesting works, among which the "Fables" are particularly admired. He died in 1732.

‡ Thomas Augustine Arne, was one of the best of English composers. He was born at London in 1710, and died in 1778. The celebrated national air, "Rule Britannia," was composed by him.

§ Charles Burney, noted for his literary and musical talents, was the father of the celebrated François Burney, who wrote "Evelina," and some other popular works of fiction. Dr. Burney died in 1815, at the age of eighty-nine.

|| Sir Humphrey Davy was born in Cornwall in 1778. He devoted himself to the study of chemistry during the greater part of his life. His lectures in the Royal Institute of London attracted crowded and brilliant audiences. He was also very fond of fishing, and wrote "Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing." His death occurred in 1829.

¶ Sir William Herschel, the world-renowned astronomer, was born at Hanover, in 1738, and was by profession a musician. He went to England in 1757, and at first devoted himself to music. His astronomical discoveries were very numerous and valuable. He died in 1822. His sister, Caroline Herschel, also attained great distinction as an astronomer, as likewise has his son, Sir John Herschel.

in length, completed in 1787, was the wonder of his age. Medical science was greatly enriched by the labors and publications of the celebrated John Hunter, the greatest physiologist and surgeon of his time. In 1785, he formed a museum, which, at his death, contained more than 10,000 specimens and preparations illustrative of human and comparative anatomy and its kindred branches. Edward Jenner, who had studied under him, gave to the world the discovery of vaccination in 1796. Geology commenced to be studied, a geological map of England being published in 1815.

75. The history of English literature during this long period is enriched with distinguished names in all its departments. During the first half of the century, the most conspicuous name is that of Samuel Johnson,* the author of the "English Dictionary," but principally famous for his talents as a poet, critic, and essayist. Gibbon and Hume stand pre-eminent as historians; Goldsmith, Young, Gray, Burns, and Cowper, as poets. The closing portion of George III.'s reign is illumined by the names of Byron, Shelley, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Scott, and a host of others, whose works have been the especial glory of the present century, being unsurpassed by any of the more recent works of genius that have appeared.

1820 76. George IV. succeeded his father at the age 1830 to of fifty-eight. He was a man of considerable talents and of polished manners, but perfectly heartless and unprincipled. During the previous part of his life he had been noted for his profligacy and extravagance. As Prince Regent he had virtually been king for ten years before his accession, in consequence of the insanity of George III.; and, consequently, his accession occasioned no change in the administration of the government. Considerable excitement was caused by the "Cato-street Conspiracy,"—the design of which was to assassinate the cabinet ministers; against whom, as representing the aristocracy, the extreme radicals felt intense hatred. The plot was discovered; and its leader, one Thistlewood, with four of his associates, was executed.

77. Nothing excited more popular indignation and disgust against the king than his treatment of his unfortunate wife, Caroline of Brunswick, whom he had married in 1795. They separated soon after the marriage; and the queen for some years afterward resided on the continent. Rumors having been circulated against her character, she determined to return to England and confront her accusers, and arrived the very day a proceeding was commenced in the House of Lords to deprive her of her rights and privileges as queen, and to dissolve her marriage with the king. She was ably defended by Henry Brougham, afterward Lord Brougham (broo'am); and, so strongly was public opinion in her favor, that the ministers abandoned the bill before it had passed the House of Lords. A public illumination showed the joy of the people at this result; and at the next session the Commons voted the queen an annuity of £50,000. In the following year she was repelled with insult from the door of Westminster Abbey, whither she had gone to see the coronation of the king; and in nineteen days afterward expired (1821).

78. The same year the king visited Ireland, where he was welcomed as the first British king who had paid a visit of peace to that afflicted isle. Shortly after his return he made an excursion to Hanover, the country of his forefathers; and the next year spent a short time in Scotland. During his visit to the latter country, one of his chief ministers, the Marquis of Londonderry (more famous as Lord Castlereagh), committed suicide. He was succeeded as foreign secretary by George Canning, one of the most distinguished parliamentary orators and statesmen of the time (1822).

79. Two years later the government declared war against Burmah, being provoked by the outrages committed by that power on the British colonies beyond the Ganges (1824). During the first campaign, Rangoon and the forts at the mouth of the Irrawaddy river were captured by Sir Archibald Campbell; and, in the next, the province of Aracan was seized by a force under General Morrison. The war was closed by a treaty, by which Aracan and the coasts of Tenasserim were given up to the British (1826). Previous to this, much attention was given to Spain, where a struggle between the people and the king aroused the sympathies of the people in favor of the former. The government, however, preserved a strict neutrality; but the Spanish colonies in South America having revolted, their independence was acknowledged by Great Britain.

80. About the same time Greece revolted (1824); and after having struggled for several years to throw off the Turkish yoke, finally secured the aid of England, France, and Russia, whose combined fleets defeated and destroyed the Turkish and Egyptian fleet in the battle of Navarino (nah-vah-re'no) (1827). By this event the independence of Greece was achieved, after which it was erected into a separate kingdom, and the crown was conferred upon Prince Otho of Bavaria. During this contest, Lord Byron went to Greece to render aid to the oppressed inhabitants; but he did not live to see the triumph of the cause, dying at Missolon'ghi, of a fever brought on by constant toil and exposure (1824).

81. The question of Catholic emancipation, so frequently agitated, was a subject of excited discussion during most of this reign. In 1822, Canning proposed that Catholic peers should sit in parliament, and carried a bill to that effect through the House of Commons; but it was rejected by the Lords. The next year the Catholic Association, under the guidance of Daniel O'Connell, began to exercise a powerful influence. This association included among its members not only O'Connell, so celebrated for his eloquence and patriotism, but many other eminent men, among them Richard Sheil, a distinguished orator and lawyer. Subsequently, O'Connell, through the influence of the association, was elected a member of Parliament (1828), and the next year took his seat; a bill for the emancipation of Catholics* having triumphantly passed both Houses (1829). The subject of parliamentary reform also excited much attention at this time. George IV. died a short time afterward (June 26, 1830).

1830 82. William IV.—The previous king having left to no heir, was succeeded by his brother, the Duke of 1837 Clarence, under the above title. He was often styled the "Sailor king," having served previously in the navy. The agitation of the question of parliamentary reform was continued; and the Duke of Wellington became very unpopular in consequence of his decided opposition to the measure. A change in the ministry soon took place; and a new cabinet being formed under the premiership of Earl Grey, a bill was introduced by Lord John Russell, proposing very extensive reforms. It was finally passed by the Commons, but rejected by the Lords; whereupon fearful riots occurred in many parts of the kingdom; and, at last,

* By this bill the Oath of Supremacy was changed; and Catholics were no longer to be excluded from the right to hold any offices except those of regent, lord chancellor of England and of Ireland, and viceroy of Ireland.

the government was obliged to yield to the demands of the people, and accept the bill (1832).

83. Three important changes were effected by this measure:—1. The right of sending members to Parliament was withdrawn from small districts, called “rotten boroughs,” in which the representation had become obsolete; 2. Several cities, which during the previous century had grown into wealth and importance, received, for the first time, the right of representation in Parliament; 3. The franchise, or right to vote, was extended more widely among the middle classes; being given, in towns, to the owners or tenants of houses paying a rent of £10 or upward. For county members all were entitled to vote who owned land worth £10 a year in rent, or who paid a yearly rent of at least £50. This constituted, without doubt, the greatest revolution which the government had experienced since 1689.

84. The same year (1832) was marked by great disturbances in Ireland, occasioned by the opposition of the people to the Protestant church establishment in that country, and to the payment of tithes in support of it, which were often wrung from the poor peasants, although on the verge of ruin and starvation. Daniel O’Connell also agitated the question of repealing the Union of 1801, and organized political associations to carry the measure (1833). The “Irish Coercion Bill,” authorizing the Lord-lieutenant to place disturbed districts under martial law was passed; but after the expiration of a year was considerably modified. This was carried by a ministry of which Lord Melbourne was the head (1834).

85. The year 1834 is particularly memorable for the abolition of slavery throughout all the British colonies. The sum of £20,000,000 was awarded by Parliament to the planters as a compensation for the loss of the slaves emancipated; and thus nearly three-fourths of a million of human beings were set free. This measure had been advocated since 1789 by William Wilberforce, who lived just long enough to see the triumph of his life's work, dying in 1833, the year in which the bill passed, though it was not to take effect till the 1st of August of the following year. William IV.'s reign was terminated by his death in 1837; but, brief as it was, it was replete with beneficent measures, which have made it dear to the memory of the English people.

1837 86. Victoria, daughter of the Duke of Kent, and niece of William IV., succeeded the latter on the throne, which she has continued to occupy up to the present time. The connection between Great Britain and Hanover, which had lasted 123 years, was dissolved on her accession, since the laws of the latter country exclude females from the throne. Her uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, eldest surviving son of George III., accordingly succeeded William IV. as King of Hanover. Queen Victoria was eighteen years of age at her accession, of pleasing, simple manners, and possessing a character well formed to habits of truthfulness, and a strict adherence to principle. No sovereign ever ascended the throne with a more solemn sense of the responsibility attending so lofty a position, or impressed with a more earnest devotion to the interests of her subjects.

87. In the first year of this reign, an insurrection broke out in Lower Canada, on account of the discontent of the people toward the government; but it was soon put down, and tranquillity restored. Upper and Lower Canada were afterward united into one province in order to give greater strength to the government (1840). At home everything was in a disturbed state in consequence of the discontent of the working-classes, whose sufferings from the scarcity of work, the high price of food, and the lowness of wages were extreme. Riots and insurrections against the government were the consequence, the people showing a determination to redress their grievances by resorting to physical force. A repeal of the Corn Laws was most vehemently demanded.

88. In connection with this agitation, a political association, called "Chartists," was formed, their object being to obtain a new Charter of government, embodying universal suffrage, vote by ballot, the abolition of the property qualification for members of Parliament, equal electoral districts, and the annual assembling of Parliament. Great mass meetings were held, at one of which as many as 200,000 persons were computed to have been present. This charter, signed by more than a million of citizens, was presented to Parliament (1839). The demands of the Chartists being refused, riots ensued, which, however, were soon put down.

89. In 1840, Queen Victoria was married to Prince Albert of Saxe-Co'burg-Go'tha (one of the German States). He was a man of refined tastes, and most benevolent and enlightened views; and, subsequently, through his efforts, many essential benefits were conferred upon the country. Parliament voted the Prince-consort an annuity of £30,000 for life, and by a bill of naturalization conferred upon him the rights and privileges of a British citizen. A short time previous to this, the Anti-corn-law League was formed at Manchester, through the influence of Richard Cobden* and others; the design being to procure the abolition not only of these obnoxious and oppressive laws, but of all others that were in conflict with the principles of free trade. It was not, however, until 1846 that the Corn Laws were repealed by Parliament.

90. An insurrection in Cabul (kah-bool') expelled the English from Af-ghan-is-tan'; and the retreating army, consisting of 17,000 men, nearly all perished among the mountain passes, from cold, famine, and the attacks of their enemies (1841). The next year, under Lord Ellenborough,* Cabul was retaken and its fortifications destroyed; but Afghanistan was abandoned. The reduction of Scinde (sind), a district on the lower Indus, by Sir Charles Na'pier,† was the next event of importance (1843), which was soon followed by a war with the Sikhs (siks) of the Pun-jab', who, after several severe conflicts, were obliged to yield to the skill and valor of the British. The conquest of these districts gave the British government control of the entire peninsula of Hindostan (1849).

91. During the same period a war was waged with China, being brought on by the unjustifiable conduct of the British traders in opium, who insisted upon importing that drug into the empire, in violation of her laws. The Chinese authorities having seized and destroyed the opium, and imprisoned Captain Elliot, the trade superintendent, the English shipping retaliated, and war ensued (1840). The island of Hong Kong was captured, and an army sent from India took Canton. Further north, Amoy was taken by Sir Henry Pottinger; and, the British forces having

† Sir Charles James Napier was previously distinguished for his exploits in the Peninsular war. His subsequent career in India was marked by great ability both in the civil and military service. He returned to England in 1851, and died two years afterward. The history of the conquest of Scinde was written by his brother Sir William Napier, the author of the "History of the Peninsular War," considered the greatest military history in the English language.

marched to the walls of Nankin, the Chinese accepted the offered terms of peace. In accordance with the treaty, Hong Kong was ceded to the British; and five ports, including Canton, were opened to foreign trade. The Chinese government also paid $21,000,000 as an indemnity for the expenses of the war (1842).

92. War was carried on at the same time in the Levant; the object being to preserve the Empire of Turkey from the hostile encroachments of Mehemet Ali (ma'he-met ah'le), the pasha of Egypt, which, it was thought, were secretly abetted by Russia and France. Having taken possession of Syria, and refusing to withdraw on the demand of Turkey, supported by Austria and Great Britain, a fleet was sent to enforce obedience, and the inhabitants of Syria were encouraged in an insurrection against him (1840). After Acre and some of the other Syrian ports had been taken by Commodore Napier,* and Alexandria threatened, the pasha agreed to withdraw his troops; and a treaty was shortly concluded with him by which Egypt was virtually yielded to him as an independent monarchy, he being made hereditary viceroy (1841).

93. At this time, the influence wielded by O'Connell in Ireland was enormous, the object of his efforts being to obtain a repeal of the Union. Monster meetings were held at Tara and other places, and immense sums of money were collected from the people to aid the cause. In consequence of some seditious expressions alleged to have been used at one of these meetings, O'Connell was arrested, and condemned on a charge of conspiracy and sedition, by the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin. The judgment was afterward reversed by the House of Lords, but the agitation was crushed for the time. O'Connell died in 1847, at Genoa, while on a journey to Rome, whither he was going for the benefit of his health.

94. The failure of the potato crop in Ireland led to increased distress in that unhappy country, vast numbers of the people dying of famine, notwithstanding the aid which was generously sent by England and the United States (1847). This was followed by a brief and abortive insurrection excited by the more violent members of the Repeal Association, who had styled themselves the "Young Ireland Party." Among them were William Smith O'Brien, Thomas Francis Meagher, and John Mitchell, the editor of the "United Irishmen." The leaders were transported, but some of them subsequently succeeded in making their escape to the United States.

95. During the same year, the Chartists, encouraged by the successful revolution in France, by which Louis Philippe had been driven from his throne (1848), renewed their agitation, and under the pretext of presenting a petition to Parliament, assembled in London to the number of 20,000. Great alarm and excitement prevailed; but, under the skilful dispositions of the Duke of Wellington, the rioters were promptly dispersed. The repeal of the Navigation Laws, which in various forms had existed for two centuries, indicated a still further advance in the principles of free trade (1849). Sir Robert Peel,* under whose energetic and enlightened administration these beneficent measures had been adopted, died shortly afterward from a fall from his horse (1850).

free trade. It was held in the Crystal Palace, at Hyde Park, a building designed by Sir Joseph Paxton, and of immense extent and great architectural beauty (1851). The first idea of this enterprise was conceived by Prince Albert, who took a leading part in its consummation; and it had also received considerable support from Sir Robert Peel.

97. A war of two years with the Caffres of South Africa (1851-3) and a second Burmese war (1852) were the means of extending the conquests of Great Britain in those regions. By the war with the Burmese the British gained the province of Pegu. This was soon followed by a war of much greater magnitude and importance, brought on by the ambitious designs of the Czar Nicholas upon the Ottoman Empire. On the ground that all members of the Greek church should be under his government, he invaded the Danubian principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia, with the design of annexing them to his own dominions (1853).

98. Great Britain having protested in vain against these encroachments on the part of Russia, entered into an alliance with France, and declared war against the Czar (1854). A fleet under Admiral Sir Charles Napier was sent to the Baltic, and destroyed the batteries of Bomarsund,* but failed to attack the great fortress of Cronstadt, at the entrance to the Russian capital. French and English fleets proceeded to the Black Sea and blockaded the harbor of Sebastopol; † and a French army under Marshal St. Arnaud (ar'no), ‡ joined with an English force under Lord Raglan, § entered the Crimea. which they routed with considerable loss September 20, (1854).

99. Unable directly to march on Sebastopol, the allies next proceeded to the harbor of Balaklava, situated a little to the south of it, in order that they might obtain supplies from their ships. In a few weeks they advanced and opened fire upon the place, which, in the meanwhile, had been strengthened by almost impregnable fortifications. An attack by the Russians on the British lines at Balaklava was repulsed after a severe battle (October 25), chiefly memorable for the brilliant but useless charge made by the light cavalry brigade under the Earl of Cardigan. Mistaking the order of Lord Raglan, this body, consisting of 600 men, made an attack upon the Russian artillery over a plain a mile and a half in length, and returned leaving more than two-thirds of their number dead on the field.

100. Another attack by the Russians at Inkermann was repulsed with terrific loss (November 5), after which the Russians kept themselves, with occasional sorties, within the defences of the city. The sufferings of the English troops during the ensuing winter were of the most heart-rending character, being ill supplied with food and the means of shelter from the inclemency of the weather, although several ships laden with stores were lying in the harbor of Balaklava. This caused a vote of censure on the government by the House of Commons, and a change of administration, Lord Palmerston becoming premier.

101. Effectual means of relieving the army were at once taken. A railway was constructed from Balaklava to the camp; and although constantly exposed to the fire of the enemy's batteries, supplies were successfully transported to the army. A submarine telegraph having been laid under the Black Sea to Varna, telegrams from the seat of war communicated to the government at London the intelligence of events an hour or two after their occurrence. Notwithstanding the death of the Czar and the accession of his son Alexander (March 2, 1855), the war was continued. Twice were the English and French generals changed. Canrobert (can-ro-bare'), assumed the command on the death of St. Arnaud, but was superseded by General Pelissier (pa-lis'se-a) (May, 1855). On the death of Raglan, the command of the British troops devolved upon General Simpson, who was soon succeeded by Sir William Codrington.

102. The French having succeeded in storming an important outwork called the "Mamelon," a terrific bombardment was kept up for several days, after which an assault was made, resulting in the capture of the fort called the Malakoff (September 8). The English also succeeded in storming a powerful fortress called the Redan, but were unable to hold it under the dreadful fire of the Russian guns. Sebastopol was, however, no longer tenable; and was therefore abandoned by the Russians during the night. The allies immediately took possession, and caused all the fortresses and dockyards to be destroyed. Thus terminated, after a duration of eleven months, one of the most extraordinary sieges described in history.

103. The fall of Sebastopol was soon followed by negotiations for peace, which was concluded by a treaty at the commencement of the next year (1856). Russia resigned her claims to the Danubian principalities; the freedom of the Danube and the Black Sea was guaranteed; and the Christian subjects of Turkey were placed under the protection of the contracting Powers. It was during this war that Florence Nightingale, so illustrious for her self-sacri-

104. The next year (1857) is remarkable for the Indian mutiny, occasioned by the introduction of Enfield rifles, for which it was necessary to use greased cartridges. The native soldiers being forbidden by their religion to taste animal food, revolted, because in loading the rifles they were compelled to bite off the ends of the cartridges. A strong feeling of alarm and discontent had also been excited in the minds of the native chiefs by the dethronement of the King of Oude† (owd) by Lord Dalhousie, the Governor-General (1856), to which was added a feeling of independence on the part of the Sepoys, the result of the injudicious and inefficient management of the East India Company.

105. The first outbreak occurred at Mee'rut, where a number of the Sepoys having been imprisoned for refusing to use the cartridges, their comrades broke open the gaol and released them, together with a large number of other prisoners. A massacre of the Europeans was immediately commenced (March 10, 1857); and the insurgents then marched on Delhi (del'le) and captured it, with all its immense stores of fire-arms and ammunition. This city was retaken by the British troops after a siege of two months, by means of the most desperate fighting, and with great loss of life (September). Cawnpore and Lucknow were the scenes of other insurrections. At the former place

* Florence Nightingale was born of English parents at Florence in 1823. Although highly educated and brilliantly accomplished, she early exhibited an intense devotion to the alleviation of suffering. In 1844, she commenced to give her attention to the condition of hospitals, which she visited and inspected in various parts of Europe, and studied under the Sisters of Charity in Paris. In 1851 she went into training as a nurse in an institution on the Rhine. All this specially fitted her for the great work which she performed in the Crimea, and by means of which she sacrificed her own health. Her "Notes on Nursing" was published in 1859.

the English were massacred with frightful atrocity by the Sepoys under Nena Sahib, (sal'eeb), who was afterward defeated by General Havelock* and Sir Colin Campbell.†

106. These two officers displayed the greatest skill and courage in their operations against the rebellion, which was finally crushed after a two years' struggle (1859). The dreadful outrages on men, women, and children perpetrated during this war by the native soldiers, and the horrible punishments afterward inflicted upon the latter by the British, scarcely find a parallel in history. This insurrection having demonstrated the inability of the East India Company to govern so large a population, its possessions were transferred to the crown, and the Queen was formally proclaimed Sovereign of India, its affairs being managed by a special member of the Cabinet (the Indian Secretary), assisted by a council, and the immediate government vested in a Viceroy, with the powers formerly possessed by the Governor-General (September 1, 1858). Thus, after an existence of more than two hundred and fifty years, the East India Company, which had founded and governed this mighty empire, ceased to exist.

107. During the Indian war hostilities were resumed against the Chinese in consequence of their seizure of a British smuggling vessel. The English governor of Hong Kong, regarding this as a national affront, ordered the bombardment of Canton, and thus brought on another Chinese war. The French took part in it with the English; and their combined forces took Canton, stormed the de-

† Sir Colin Campbell, afterward Lord Clyde, one of the most distinguished British generals of modern times, was born at Glasgow in 1792. He served in the Peninsular war, and took part in the expedition to the United States in 1814. He also served in the Chinese, Afghan, and Crimean wars, taking a prominent part in the battles of the Alma and Balaklava. He received his title in 1858, as a reward for his exploits in India.

fences of Pekin, and having reached that city took and pillaged the Emperor's summer palace. The Chinese then submitted to the terms of peace dictated by these European conquerors, throwing open the country to the merchants and missionaries of Europe (1860). Difficulties with Persia about the same time were settled in a similar manner, the British ships capturing its chief port, Bushire (boo-sheer),* and other towns, thus compelling the Shah to sue for peace.

108. By the sagacity and skill of Lord Elgin, the British minister in China, communications were opened with Japan, affording to British enterprise opportunities for a very valuable commerce with that country. The attempt to establish friendly relations with Abyssinia was not so successful. One of the native chiefs having made quite extensive conquests, assumed the title of King Theodore; and, taking offence at the English, imprisoned the consul and several other persons, subjecting them to very great indignities and sufferings. Every attempt to procure their release by negotiation having failed, an expedition under Sir Robert Napier was sent to accomplish their rescue by force. After a difficult march of four hundred miles from the sea-coast, Magdala, the stronghold of Theodore, was reached and soon stormed. Theodore having perished by his own hand, and the captives having been released, the British retired from the country (1868).

109. Another measure of parliamentary reform was carried in 1867, the effect of which was to extend the elective franchise, and to increase the number of representatives for Scotland and Ireland by equalizing the election districts. The most important measure which has been adopted since then is the abolition of the established church in Ireland, a very tardy act of justice to that long-suffering and much-oppressed country. This was carried after a very violent struggle in both Houses, and is now (1870) being carried into effect. It frees the Irish people from the support of a church to which they do not belong, and which is opposed to their own religious faith.

110. The greatest domestic affliction which Queen Victoria has suffered was the loss of Prince Albert, who died of typhoid fever in 1861. His public spirit, beneficent character, and ardent zeal in all enterprises for the benefit of the country, and the enthusiastic interest which he took in both science and art, made him the idol of the people, and his death was deplored as a national loss. He left four sons and five daughters. The eldest of the latter was married in 1858 to Frederic William, Crown Prince of Prussia. The liberality of the queen in all measures of reform, her ready acquiescence in the will of her people, when definitely ascertained and legitimately expressed, and her social and domestic virtues, have won for her the esteem and affection of all classes of her subjects.

STATE OF SOCIETY SINCE THE ACCESSION OF GEORGE IV.

111. During this period, which comprehends the last half century (from 1820 to 1870), the political changes which have occurred indicate a marked progress in liberal government, and the spread of enlightened views as to the rights and privileges of the middle and lower orders of the people. Sounder and more judicious principles of government have prevailed, as are indicated by the repeal of the corn and navigation laws, the measures of parliamentary reform adopted, and the establishment of a free trade policy.*

112. The severity of criminal law has been greatly mitigated, in pursuance of a policy advocated during the first part of the century by Romilly, Mackintosh, and others. Petty theft, until 1808, was punished by death, and the execution of scores of criminals together was a frequent spectacle in London. In 1837 a bill was passed abolishing the death-penalty for at least two-thirds of the crimes to which it had been assigned; and since that time it has been further restricted, and the whole character of criminal legislation has been greatly ameliorated.

113. The progress of pure religious sentiment has been strikingly manifested by the establishment of very many societies for the propagation of Christianity, the diffusion of religious knowledge, and the philanthropic aid as well as instruction of the ignorant, the destitute, and the suffering in all parts of the kingdom; while the foreign missionary enterprises have been very numerous and active. Much has also been done to promote the cause of general education, by improvements in the national schools, and by the establishment of societies for the spread of knowledge among the people. Of the latter the London Mechanics' Institute, founded in 1823; the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, instituted in 1826; and the University of London, founded in 1828, are examples.

114. The material progress made by the nation during this period has been truly wonderful. The achievements in science and art perhaps surpass those of all the preceding centuries combined, and bring to the poorest classes comforts and conveniences which could not previously have been enjoyed by kings and nobles. The country has been crossed in every direction by railroads of the very best construction; ocean steam-vessels have revolutionized commerce and navigation; the electric telegraph has brought every part of the kingdom into instant communication with all other parts of the civilized world; while the building of iron-clad war-steamers has rendered obsolete all former achievements in naval architecture, and changed entirely the character of maritime warfare.

115. The improvements in printing, including the general use of stereotype and electrotype plates, and the steam printing-press, have greatly facilitated the diffusion of knowledge, and augmented the number of journals, periodicals, and books of all kinds circulated among the people. The literature of the period is enriched by the productions of Ten'ny-son, the poet-laureate; Thack'e-ray, Dickens, and Bulwer, among novelists; and Ma-cau'lay, Carlyle, Buckle, De Quincey, and many others, historians, essayists, etc., who, in every department of prose and poetry, have shed lustre upon the language and literature of their country.

A P P E N D I X .

I. THE BRITISH CONSTITUTION.

1. THE Constitution of Great Britain, unlike our Federal and State Constitutions, is composed of the whole body of public law, including all the various political principles established at different times by legislative enactment, and expressing the general will of the nation. No part of English history is more interesting or instructive than that which exhibits the development of this political system, as the great mass of the people gradually emerged from a condition of ignorance and servitude to one of enlightenment and freedom. By revolution after revolution, each branch of government received its proper limitation, and the sovereign power virtually passed from the hands of the sceptered monarch to the voice of the people, as expressed by their representatives in Parliament.

2. Parliament consists of two branches—the House of Lords and the House of Commons. In the former are represented the interests of the nobility or aristocracy, and those of the Church, which is established by law. Hence there are Lords spiritual and Lords temporal in this, called the “Upper House;” the former consisting of twenty-six prelates of the Church of England and four of the Irish Church. The number of Lords temporal is not permanently fixed, the sovereign having the power to increase it by conferring new titles. Of these there are five ranks: dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons, all of whom, collectively, are styled Lords, or Peers of the Realm.

3. The House of Lords is an hereditary body, as far as regards the English peers: the Irish peers serve for life, and the Scottish peers sit only during one Parliament. The latter are sixteen in number; of the Irish peers there are twenty-eight. Both of these are respectively elected by the peerage of the country which they represent. The House of Lords can alone originate any bills that affect the rights or privileges of the nobility, and no amendments or alterations can be made in them by the Commons. This House is also the highest judicial tribunal in the kingdom. Peers can be tried only therein, as well as officers of State when impeached by the Lower House. It is also the last court of appeal from all other tribunals of inferior jurisdiction. The number of members of this House generally exceeds, in the aggregate, four hundred.

4. The House of Commons includes the representatives of counties, cities, boroughs, and some of the universities, the whole number amounting to six hundred and fifty-eight, nearly five-eighths of whom are returned by England and Wales. The principal element of power possessed by the Commons is the exclusive right to vote supplies for the carrying on of the government. All money-bills must, therefore, originate in this House, and may be rejected, but cannot be altered, by the Lords. No Parliament can sit longer than seven years; and a new Parliament must be summoned by the sovereign within six months after his accession, and within three years from the dissolution of any Parliament.

5. The executive power is exercised by the sovereign, but only through ministers, who are responsible to the people for every act performed by royal authority. Hence arises the maxim, "The King can do no wrong," his ministers alone being answerable. The chief of these constitute the Cabinet, which is composed of the following officers—the First Lord of the Treasury, or Premier; the Lord Chancellor; the Lord Privy Seal; the President of the Council; the Home Secretary; the Foreign Secretary; the Colonial Secretary; the Indian Secretary; the War Secretary; the Chancellor of the Exchequer; the First Lord of the Admiralty; the President of the Board of Trade; the President of the Poor Law Board; the Postmaster-General; the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

6. When the ministry fail to carry any important measure through Parliament, they usually resign; but the sovereign may dissolve the Parliament, and cause writs to be issued for the calling of a new one; and if this refuse to sanction the measures of the government, a new ministry must be formed. Thus the executive is entirely dependent upon the will of the nation as declared by its representatives. Parliament may also be prorogued by the authority of the sovereign to any appointed time; and the effect of such prorogation is to quash all proceedings pending at the time, except impeachments in the Commons, and judicial appeals in the Lords. Either House may adjourn separately by its own authority; but during such adjournment it may be called together by the sovereign.

7. The Privy Council is another very important body in connection with the executive. It consists of a large number of dignitaries, both civil and ecclesiastical, appointed by the sovereign, all of whom must be natural-born subjects of Great Britain. The Cabinet Ministers form, as it were, a Committee of the Privy Council, the president of which is the fourth great officer of state. Meetings are held once in two or three weeks, but none of the members attend except such as are specially summoned by the sovereign, the meetings usually consisting of the Cabinet Ministers, the great officers of the queen's household, and the Archbishop of Canterbury. On extraordinary occasions, however, all the members are summoned.

8. No act of parliament can become a law without the formal assent of the sovereign; but the refusal to give such assent has become obsolete, not having been exercised since 1707—during the reign of Queen Anne. Indeed, the necessity for it does not now exist, being removed by the fact that the sovereign rules through his ministers, and that these only continue in office as long as they can command the support of Parliament.

9. The duties of the sovereign, as prescribed in the coronation oath, are, first, to rule according to law; secondly, to execute judgment in mercy; and thirdly, to maintain the established religion. The royal prerogatives are, the power of making war and peace (the former restrained by the necessity of obtaining supplies from Parliament), the right to send and receive ambassadors, the power of conferring honors and titles, of appointing judges and subordinate magistrates, of giving and revoking commissions in the army and navy, of pardoning offences, of giving or withholding his assent to acts of parliament, and, as head of the national church, the right to nominate to vacant bishoprics and other ecclesiastical preferments.

10. The laws of Great Britain consist of the Common Law and the Statute Law. The former is based upon custom and precedent, as established by previous decisions of the courts; the latter consists of the various acts of parliament passed from time to time. In addition to this, there is the law of Equity, which is applied, by the sovereign, through the Lord Chancellor, in all cases where injustice would follow the operation of the Common law. The Courts of Chancery, or Equity, of Queen's (or King's) Bench, of Common Pleas, and of Exchequer, are the principal law courts in England and Ireland; in Scotland they are the Court of Session and the High Court of Justiciary.

II. GENERAL VIEW OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

The term British Empire is applied to the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with all its colonies and dependencies. These embrace the following:—

EUROPEAN.

1. The Channel Islands, a group lying off the northwest coast of France, and formerly belonging to the Duchy of Normandy, and therefore attached to the English throne since the conquest. King John lost all Normandy except these islands.

2. Gibraltar, a rocky promontory 1500 feet high, forming the southern extremity of Spain, about three miles in length, with an average breadth of three-quarters of a mile. Its classical name was Calpe; its present name is derived from the Arabic word Gibel, a mountain, and Tarik, the Saracen general by whom Spain was invaded in the eighth century. It was taken by the British, under Sir George Rooke, in 1704, and ceded to England by the treaty of Utrecht. It is one of the most valuable military and naval stations possessed by Great Britain, being the Key of the Mediterranean Sea.

3. Heligoland (Holy Land), a rocky islet situated off the estuary of the Elbe river. It derives its name from the religious rites of which it was the scene under the Saxons. It was occupied by Great Britain in 1807, and ceded formally to it in 1814. It contains a lighthouse and a small village, the inhabitants of which are occupied as pilots or engaged in the lobster and haddock fisheries.

4. Man, an island in the Irish Sea, originally peopled by the Manx, a Celtic tribe, the language of whom is still in common use in the island. It was held as a feudal sovereignty by the Earls of Derby, and subsequently by the Duke of Athol; from whom it was purchased in 1795, but the interests of the family in it were not entirely extinguished till 1829. It has its own separate constitution and legislature, the latter consisting of the representatives of the people, and called the "House of Keys."

5. Malta, an island about seventeen miles in length and nine in breadth, situated in the Mediterranean Sea, nearly sixty miles south of Sicily. On account of its position and the enormous strength of its fortifications, it is of immense value as a naval station ; and is consequently one of the most important of the British dependencies. Near the northwest coast is a small island called Gozo, which also belongs to Great Britain. In 1530, these islands were given by the Emperor Charles V. to the Knights of St. John, whose stronghold at Rhodes had been captured by the Turks a short time previously. Malta sustained several tremendous assaults from the Turks while in the possession of the Knights, from whom it was taken by Napoleon in 1798. The Maltese, with the aid of the British, retook it soon afterward ; and, by the Congress of Vienna (in 1815), it was confirmed as a British dependency. The population of these islands is about 140,000.

ASIATIC.

1. India, including Hindostan and several provinces on the eastern shore of the Bay of Bengal. Its extent from the great mountain barrier on the north to Cape Comorin, its southern extremity, is about 1800 miles ; and from the western boundary of Scinde to Pegu, about 1900 miles. Its area is about 1,500,000 square miles, with a coast line of nearly 4,500 miles ; and it contains a population of about 156 millions. The various countries and provinces are placed under local governors, lieutenant-governors, and commissioners, all of whom are subject to the viceroy, appointed by and responsible to the crown. The administration is under the direction of the Indian Secretary. The history of this, the most splendid of the British dependencies, has been given in connection with the text.

2. Ceylon, a considerable island to the south of Hindostan, including an area of more than 25,000 square miles, also belongs to Great Britain, by whom it was taken from the Dutch in 1796. It was formally ceded to the British by the treaty of Amiens (1802). The native kingdom of Kandy did not, however, submit to their sway until 1815.

3. Malacca, a maritime settlement on the southwest coast of the Malay Peninsula, forty miles by twenty-five, with a population of about 80,000. It was taken from the Portuguese by the Dutch in 1642 ; but, in 1795, it fell into the hands of the British, to whom it was formally ceded in 1824.

4. Singapore, an island, twenty-five miles by fourteen, with a city of the same name on its southern shore. The total population, consisting of Chinese, Malays, various Indian races, and Europeans, is about 100,000. In 1818, as found by Sir Stamford Raffles, it was covered with primeval forests, uninhabited except by a few fishermen and pirates who found shelter in its secluded rivers and bays. It was then claimed by the Sultan of Lahore, from whom it was purchased by the British in 1824. Its commanding position, in the centre of the highway leading from British India to China, makes it an exceedingly valuable possession, being the entrepot of the vast trade with those countries.

5. Prince of Wales Island, sometimes called Penang, or Pu'lo Penang, situated at the mouth of the Strait of Malacca, near the west coast of the Malay peninsula. It has an area of 154 square miles, and a population of about 50,000. Its capital is Georgetown, which is also the seat of government for Malacca and Singapore. Toward the end of the last century, Captain Light married the King of Queda's daughter, and received this island as a wedding-present, which he afterward transferred to the East India Company. The province of Wellesley, situated on the opposite shore of the peninsula, was purchased by the Company in 1802. The productions of these settlements are very valuable; but their trade has been greatly diminished, owing to the more favorable situation of Singapore.

6. Sarawak and Labuan.—The former of these was obtained by the enterprise of Sir James Brooke, to whom it was granted in 1840 by the Sultan of Borneo, as a recompense for aid furnished him in subduing some of his rebellious subjects. During the first Chinese war, Brooke was aided by a British vessel of war in reducing the pirates who were supported by the Sultan; and in 1846 it was formally taken by the British, Brooke being made viceroy. In 1847, the British took possession of the island of Labuan (lah-boo-an') which had previously been ceded to them by the Sultan. It is situated at a short distance to the north of the town of Borneo, and is chiefly valuable as a naval station between the East Indies and China.

7. Hong Kong, a small island at the mouth of Canton river, about one hundred miles from the city of Canton. It is nine miles long and from two to six broad. Its capital, Victoria, is situated on the northern shore, and in a short time has become one of the most thriving and beautiful of the British dependencies in Asia. The island was occupied by the British in 1841, and ceded to them by the treaty with China made at the close of the war, in 1842.

8. Aden, a town in the southwestern part of Arabia, held by means of a strong garrison and powerful fortifications, by the British, to whom it was ceded by the Sultan in 1838, and taken possession of by force of arms in 1839, the Sultan desiring to withdraw from his contract. In a commercial point of view, it is a very important possession, having a position between Asia and Africa, like that of Gibraltar between Europe and Africa. The old commercial route, by way of the Red Sea, having, within the last few years, been resumed, Aden has become still more valuable as a stopping-place for steam-vessels between Bombay and Suez. Its population is about 25,000.

AUSTRALIAN.

1. Australia, called by the Dutch settlers New Holland, contains the colonies of New South Wales, founded in 1788; West Australia, in 1829; South Australia, in 1834; Victoria, in 1851; and Queensland, in 1859. In 1851, gold was discovered in the island; and, in consequence, the tide of emigration set so rapidly thither; that its settlements soon reached a point of great magnitude and importance. Its present population is estimated at upward of a million. The possession of the island by Great Britain is based upon the discoveries of Captains Cook, Bass, Flinders, and others.

2. Tasmania, or Van Diemen's Land, was discovered in 1642, by a Dutch navigator named Tasman, after whom it has been named. It was named by him Van Diemen's Land in honor of the governor of Batavia. Bass, in 1798, by sailing through the strait which bears his name, discovered it to be an island. The British for some time used it, as well as New South Wales, as a penal settlement; but, in 1825, it was made an independent colony, under the name of Tasmania. Norfolk Island, situated more than a thousand miles to the east of Australia, was made a British penal settlement in 1825; but it was broken up in 1855, and the island given to the inhabitants of Pitcairn's Island, 194 in number, the descendants of the mutineers of the ship Bounty.

3. New Zealand.—This colony consists of three islands, two large and one much smaller, with a number of islets near the coasts. The group is situated in the South Pacific Ocean, about 1200 miles southeast of Australia, and contains nearly 100,000 square miles. It was discovered in 1642 by Tasman, and was visited several times by Captain Cook, who explored the coasts in 1770. It was at first frequented by English and American whale-ships, attracted thither by the excellent shelter afforded by its numerous harbors, particularly in the Bay of Islands. Missionary enterprise began in 1814, and a British resident, or consul, was appointed in 1833. The sovereignty of the islands was formally ceded to Great Britain by the native chiefs in 1840. The unjust treatment of the Maories, or natives, brought on a series of fierce and bloody conflicts, which were not terminated until quite recently.

AFRICAN.

1. Cape Colony embraces an extensive region, the area of which is estimated to contain about 200,000 square miles. It derives its name from the Cape of Good Hope, at which the capital, Cape Town, is situated. It was for many years a dependency of the Dutch, by whom it was first settled in 1652. In 1795, it was taken by the British, but restored by the treaty of Amiens (1802). In 1806 it was again captured by the British, and since then has remained in their possession. Fierce wars have been waged with the Kaffirs, or Caffrés, a native tribe of great courage and ferocity. From these was wrested, in 1847, a region called Caffraria,—which was recently annexed to Cape Colony.

2. Natal, which was so called by the Portuguese because it was discovered on Christmas day (1498). It became a British colony in 1843. Its capital, Port Natal, contains the only good harbor on that coast. It is situated about eight hundred and fifty miles from Cape Town.

3. Mauritius, an island about five hundred miles east of Madagascar, and containing more than seven hundred square miles, affords another important station for British vessels. It was discovered in 1505 by the Portuguese, but received its name from the Dutch, in honor of Prince Maurice, who in 1644 formed a settlement upon it. In 1721 it was colonized by the French, by whom it was named "Isle of France." It was taken from them in 1810 by General Abercrombie, and has since then been occupied by the British.

4. Amirante and Seychelle Islands, two groups of islets north of Madagascar Island, were captured from the French in 1794.

5. St. Helena, a rocky islet in the South Atlantic, was discovered by the Portuguese in 1502; but afterward was occupied by the Dutch, from whom it was taken by the English in 1651. Its position in the direct line of the great ocean thoroughfare from Europe to the East has made it important as a stopping-place for vessels performing that long voyage. Its chief celebrity is derived from the exile of the Emperor Napoleon, who lived there from 1816 till his death in 1821. Ascension, another small solitary islet, situated on the Atlantic, about eight hundred miles to the north of St. Helena, has been occupied by the British since 1815. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1501, on Ascension-day, from which circumstance it received its name. Tristan d'Acunha, a group of islands to the south of St. Helena, is also claimed by Great Britain, by whom a garrison was kept there during the banishment of Napoleon.

6. Sierra Leone consists of a district about twenty-five miles in length by twelve miles in breadth. The colony was established in 1787, for the purpose of providing a home for negroes rescued from the slave-traders.

7. Gambia is a colony consisting of the island of St. Mary and town of Bathurst, at the mouth of the Gambia River. It has a flourishing trade. The Gold Coast in Western Africa is also claimed by Great Britain.

NORTH AMERICAN.

1. Canada.—This name was first applied to the region watered by the St. Lawrence, a river discovered by Cartier, in 1535. It is an Indian word, meaning "a collection of huts." The province was ceded by the French to Great Britain by the treaty of Paris, in 1763. It was afterward divided into the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, subsequently called Canada West and Canada East. These divisions are now designated, respectively, Ontario and Quebec, and constitute a part of the Dominion of Canada, which comprises, besides these, the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

2. Nova Scotia was colonized first by the French, under the name of Acadia, but ceded to the English by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. Cape Breton Island became a British possession by the capture of Louisburg, in 1758, during the French and Indian war.

3. New Brunswick formed a part of Acadia, and was ceded to Great Britain by the treaty of Utrecht.

4. Prince Edward's Island, formerly known as St. John's Island, was taken after the fall of Louisburg, in 1758.

5. Newfoundland, discovered by the Cabots, in 1497, was formally taken possession of by Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1588. Its valuable fisheries led to rival claims to it on the part of the French and English. These were settled by the treaty of Utrecht, the island being wholly surrendered to the English.

6. British Columbia and Vancouver's Island.—These regions formally constituted a portion of the Hudson's Bay Company Territory, a vast region embracing a large part of British America, chiefly valuable for the trade in furs. After the discovery of gold in the vicinity of the Fraser River, the region soon became quite populous, and was organized as a separate province (1865).

7. Honduras, or Belize, forms the southeastern part of the peninsula of Yucatan, and has an area of about 20,000 square miles. The claim of Great Britain to this region was formally sanctioned by Spain in 1783.

8. The Bermudas, a group of islands in the Atlantic Ocean, were named after Bermudez, a Spaniard, by whom they were discovered in 1527. The wreck, upon these islands, of a part of the expedition sent to Virginia in 1609, under Sir George Somers, led to their colonization. They are, on this account, sometimes called the Somers Islands. The group is said to contain about three hundred and sixty islets, separated by very narrow channels, and hence occupying but a small space in the ocean, estimated at about one hundred square miles. Five only of these islands are of any considerable size.

WEST INDIAN.

1. Jamaica, discovered by Columbus in 1494, was colonized by the Spaniards in 1509, and held by them till its conquest by Admirals Penn and Venables in 1655; since which time it has been under the government of Great Britain.

2. Trinidad, a considerable island (fifty miles by thirty), near the northern coast of South America, opposite one of the mouths of the Orinoco river, was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and colonized by the Spaniards in 1588. It was taken by the British in 1797.

3. Besides these two large islands the British possess several other smaller ones belonging to the West Indies; as follows: Barbadoes, St. Vincent, Tobago, Grenada, St. Lucia, Dominica, Montserrat, Antigua, St. Kitts, Nevis, Anguilla, and the Virgin Islands. The Bahama Islands have been occupied by them since 1629.

SOUTH AMERICAN.

1. British Guiana was colonized at first by the Dutch, but fell into the possession of the British in 1781, being taken by Sir George Rodney. It was, however, restored in 1783, but again captured in 1796, and again restored by the treaty of Amiens in 1802. The next year, on the breaking out of the war, it was once more captured, and since then has remained a British dependency.

2. The Falkland Islands were discovered by Davis in 1593, but did not receive their present name till 1690, when they were visited by Captain Strong, an English navigator. Settlements were afterward made on them by the French and Spaniards as well as the English; but since 1771 they have formed a part of the British Empire. No permanent settlement was made till 1831, and their population at the present time is only about seven hundred. They constitute the most southerly of the organized colonies of Great Britain. Great Britain also claims, in addition to the various possessions mentioned above, the Cocos, or Keeling Islands, in the Indian Ocean; Perim, in the Red Sea, and Karak, in the Persian Gulf. Great Feejee, the largest of the Feejee Islands, in the Pacific Ocean, was a few years ago ceded to Great Britain by the native king.

The whole extent of this vast empire embraces a little over eight millions of square miles, and contains a population of nearly two hundred and twenty millions.

ANDERSON'S SCHOOL HISTORIES.

PRACTICAL BOOKS BY A PRACTICAL TEACHER.

A Grammar-School History of the United States.

By JOHN J. ANDERSON, A.M., late Principal of Grammar School No. 81, New York City; Author of a Manual of General History, A Pictorial School History of the United States, etc., etc. Illustrated with more than 40 Maps. 16mo. 258 pages.

CHARACTERISTIC FEATURES.—1. The narrative is written with great clearness and conciseness, and is brought down to the present time. 2. Unimportant matters are entirely omitted, or only incidentally alluded to. 3. The history and the geography are taught together. 4. The book is fully supplied with Maps, and the location of every place mentioned is accurately shown. 5. All the proper names are accurately pronounced in connection with the names as they occur. 6. The plan affords frequent and systematic reviews by topics. 7. Two entirely different sets of questions run through the book. 8. It contains the Constitution of the United States, with full explanations and class-exercises. 9. It contains Washington's Farewell Address. 10. It contains, at the close of the book, a complete resumé of the whole history, arranged for topical study and recitation. 11. It contains but 260 pages. 12. It is sold at a moderate price.

The publishers believe that teachers who are tired of the cumbersome histories of our country now largely in use, and desire a book with which they can produce satisfactory results, will find that this work will exactly meet their wants.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,

Superintendent's Office, City of New York.

"I have carefully examined Anderson's Histories, adopted by the Board of Education, and used in the Public Schools of this city, and cheerfully commend them to the favorable regard of teachers and School officers, as well adapted to the purposes of instruction in this branch of study, and as excellent and comprehensive compendiums of the leading events of history."

S. S. RANDALL, Sup't of Schools.

"Anderson's Histories have been in use in the Grammar Schools of this city from the date of their publication, and, as far as I know, have given the highest degree of satisfaction. They are written in a clear, concise style, are unusually accurate, and abound in exercises which only a practical teacher could have constructed, and which make them invaluable Class Manuals. They can scarcely fail to prove acceptable wherever practically tried."

HENRY KIDDLE, Ass't Sup't of Schools.

From Fifty-seven Principals of Grammar Schools in the City of New York.

"We are using Anderson's Histories in our schools with complete success. For class-room instruction they are, we believe, superior to any other works on the subject with which we are acquainted."

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,

Superintendent's Office, Brooklyn.

"This is to certify that I am well acquainted with Anderson's Histories, they having been in the Public Schools of this city during the last three years. After having seen a variety of works on the subject tried here, I am confident that ANDERSON'S are decidedly the best for class-room instruction. They give the teacher just the aid he needs to produce satisfactory results, and I therefore give them my unqualified recommendation."

J. W. BULKLEY, Sup't of Schools.

"Mr. Anderson has, I think, found the golden mean in nearly every feature that should characterize a judicious school history."

JAMES CRUIKSHANK, Ass't Sup't of Schools.

From the Principals of the Grammar Schools in the City of Brooklyn.

"It gives us pleasure, after using Anderson's Histories in our schools during the last two years, to say that we like them. The plan of instruction, combining the geography with the chronology of the narrative, is one which gives the books a decided superiority over the works of other authors on the subject. They have our hearty commendation."

PUBLISHED BY CLARK & MAYNARD, NEW YORK.

Bloss's Ancient History.

Illustrated by colored Maps, and a Chronological Chart. For the use of Schools and Families. Revised and improved by JOHN J. ANDERSON, A. M., Author of a Series of School Histories. 1 vol. 12mo. 450 pages.

This work is a condensed history of the world as known to the Ancients of Europe and Asia. The narrative begins with the Creation, and, continuing through the histories of Assyria, Egypt, and Rome, ends with the downfall of the Roman Empire. The style is exceedingly graceful and happy, combined with great brevity and clearness of statement. The study of Ancient History, which is usually so dry and uninteresting to the pupil, is, by the use of this work, made attractive and agreeable. The work contains large colored Maps and a Chronological Chart, and in addition to questions at the bottom of the pages, has a different set of questions at the end of the Sections, for topical review. It has also a full pronouncing index.

From Miss MARY E. THALHEIMER, Teacher of History in the Packer Collegiate Institute.

PACKER COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, Brooklyn, March 8th, 1869.

"Bloss's Ancient History, as edited by Mr. Anderson, is used now for the second year in three Departments of the Packer Institute. * * * * * For my own part, I have only to express a very high appreciation of the work, for the clear and attractive style of the narrative, and the great interest it has awakened in my classes. I know of no other School History which is at once so condensed and so entertaining, which, including so many nations and such various periods of time, manages to maintain so much of the charm of an easy flowing narrative with the accuracy of a general outline."

From Dr. T. S. PINNEO, Author of a series of English Grammars, Guide to Composition, &c., &c.

"I have used Bloss's Ancient History in my classes with decided success. In style, in selection and arrangement of matter, in the union of comprehensiveness with brevity, and in its power of securing attention and interest, I know of no work that surpasses it. I can cordially recommend it as a model class-book."

From Prof. A. MARKHAM, Principal Milwaukee Academy, Milwaukee, Wis.

"I have examined Bloss's Ancient History with very great pleasure and satisfaction. The Maps and Chronological Chart are excellent, and contribute largely to the value and completeness of the work. The interesting style in which the book is written cannot fail to render it an attractive text-book for the student. It is just such a text-book as we have long needed."

From Hon. A. E. RANKIN, Secretary of the Vermont Board of Education.

"Anderson's Bloss's Ancient History comprises in scarcely more than 400 pages an intelligible outline of Ancient History, from the Creation of man to the Fall of the Roman Empire. It is the best text-book in this department that has come under my notice. The style is clear, concise, and attractive. The work exhibits the same care in systematic arrangement and judicious collocation of related facts, which have commended his series of United States Histories to the intelligent teacher. It is easy to see that Mr. Anderson has spent many years as a practical teacher."
